

MYSTERY RELIGIONS IN THE ANCIENT WORLD

JOSCELYN GODWIN

JOSCELYN GODWIN

MYSTERY RELIGIONS

IN THE ANCIENT WORLD

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS, San Francisco
Cambridge, Hagerstown, New York, Philadelphia, 1817 London, Mexico City, São Paulo, Sydney

Acknowledgments

The author is grateful to Jill Purce for helping to conceive the idea of this book, and for her ever discerning criticism; to Jane Powell, for inspiration en route; and to Janet Godwin, for helping him to finish it. He also thanks his colleagues at Colgate University, particularly William Skelton and Dexter Morrill, for their kindly encouragement of his broader interests, and for material assistance from the Humanities Faculty Development Fund.

General Editor: Jill Purce

© 1981 Thames and Hudson Ltd, London.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews. For information address Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc., 10 East 53rd Street, New York, NY 10022. Published simultaneously in Canada by Fitzhenry & Whiteside, Limited, Toronto.

FIRST U.S. EDITION

Printed in Great Britain

LC: 81-47423

ISBN: 0-06-0631406

81 82 83 84 85 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

Introduction	7
---------------------	---

THE PATH OF THE WARRIOR	11
THE PATH OF THE MONK	17
THE PATH OF THE MAGICIAN	22
THE PATH OF LOVE	26
THE PATH OF KNOWLEDGE	31

Chapters

I THE ROMAN GODS	38
II MYTHOLOGY	48
III THE IMPERIAL CULT	56
IV MAGICAL AND FOLK BELIEFS	64
V PHILOSOPHERS	70
VI JUDAISM	78
VII GNOSTICISM	84
VIII CHRISTIANITY	90
IX MITHRAS AND AION	98
X CYBELE AND ATTIS	110
XI ISIS AND SERAPIS	120
XII DIONYSUS	132
XIII ORPHEUS AND HERCULES	144
XIV THE OVERSEERS	150
XV SYNCRETISM	164

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY	172
PHOTOGRAPHIC ACKNOWLEDGMENTS	173
INDEX	173

MOMUS: Tell, me, O Zeus, however did Attis, and Corybas, and Sabazius ever get trundled in upon us? Or Mithras over there, the Mede, in his caftan and cap, who doesn't even speak Greek? And you, too, dog-faced Anubis – how do you think you'll pass for a god if you keep barking? I'm ashamed, Zeus, to mention all the ibises, monkeys, billy-goats and worse beasts still, which have somehow been smuggled out of Egypt into Heaven. However can you bear it, Gods, to see them worshipped as much as yourselves, or even more? And you, Zeus, how can you put up with those rams' horns they stick on your head?

ZEUS: All these points you mention about the Egyptians are in truth unseemly. Nevertheless, Momus, most of them are matters of symbolism; and one who is not an adept in the Mysteries really should not laugh at them.

(Lucian, The Parliament of Gods 9–11)

Introduction

An extraordinary variety of paths was open to the Mediterranean and European peoples in the last centuries before, and the first centuries after Christ. The subjects of the Roman Empire enjoyed a freedom of choice in religious matters unparalleled until modern times. The similarity goes further: so far, indeed, that it seems almost as though the present epoch is an accelerated recapitulation of the earlier one. In such a case it is possible to use past history as a lens through which to view more clearly our own age – and vice versa. In both epochs we see the old religions degenerating through loss of genuine enthusiasm (in the original sense of the term). Priests and ministers cling to their rituals out of fear or habit, and have nothing to teach the people but morality. The old Roman religion had grown as fossilized and uninspiring as modern 'Churchianity', yet the alternatives of agnosticism or atheism, while useful as a cleansing reaction, left the soul as bleak then as they do now. In answer to its need, illumination comes from another direction: lux ex Oriente. In those days it was the cults of Asia Minor, Egypt and the Near East that shed their light over the Empire; in these it is especially the discovery of the Far Eastern religions, in all their variety, which brings new life to the aspirations of those Westerners who are receptive to them. They proclaim that the sole purpose of life is spiritual development, for which each can find a means best suited in nature and level. Of course this could lead a modern person back to Christ, but then it would be with a new understanding and in a new relationship. Theory is transformed into experience, and mysteries – 'the hidden things' – become the central concern of life.

Too long have we learnt about ancient religion from unbelieving academics or from Christian chauvinists, divorcing it on the one hand from life and on the other from faith. I have the highest respect for the industry and dedication of our archaeologists and classicists, but not for the attitude that approaches the Mysteries in the same spirit as the classification of potsherds. Already the study of living religions is escaping from the obligatory agnosticism which used to be demanded by the modern Academy; and the case should be no different with ancient religion. I do not want to learn about Plato from a logical positivist, but from a Platonist. Is it possible to comprehend that in which one does not believe?

My frame of reference is the 'Perennial Philosophy', which I use for want of a better term to denote the philosophy that assumes a transcendent unity behind all religions, and sees them all as attempts, each valid for its time and place, to point the way to the true goal of human existence. Many people can accept this as it applies to the great religions current today: Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity, Islam. But it is a different matter when it comes to religions as remote as those of Cybele, Mithras or Orpheus. Often they are regarded merely as bizarre and rather fin-de-siècle attempts to repair a loss of faith in the old Roman religion. They were much more than this. There were millions of devotees – human beings not so very different from ourselves – who lived and died in these – to us – strange faiths.

A deliberate effort of the imagination is necessary in order to comprehend them. It is not enough just to empathize with the religious impulse in general: one must put one's own self in the position, say, of a person for whom Cybele is God, and all that that can mean. In the case of a Mystery initiation, one must imagine one's entire life story, here and now, pivoting around the great event. Consider the high points of your life, the irrevocable stages and decisions that most affect your progress from birth to death: marriages, the choice of a career, meetings with remarkable persons . . . Imagine that there looms with comparable importance your initiation into the Mysteries of the Great Mother through the taurobolium, the ritual bull-sacrifice. Visualize yourself during the days of preparation: your nervousness, the expense and difficult stage-management of the event, culminating in that moment when you stand in the pit and are drenched in warm blood as the bull dies on the platform overhead. This is one of the things you have lived for, and you are never the same again.

I have chosen an extreme example – though not the most extreme, as readers will discover. Personally I find the idea repulsive, but much in the way that certain foods or diets may repel me. I do not for that reason call them poison. There are those who are nourished by them, and for whom they are absolutely right; and so I believe it is with religion. But how can one discover the rightness in practices and beliefs so far distanced from the modern appetite? Only through understanding that there are many ways to the goal, and many sorts and conditions of men, each treading his own path thither, whether he knows it or not.

The experiences and concerns of Mystery initiates are not the lot of all people, and are often inaccessible even in imagination to those who do not share them. The more intense they are, the more private they tend to be: if aired in public they only run the risk of being misunderstood. This is why there are 'mystery' religions. Mysteries are things which are kept silent, in order to avoid useless arguments and misapprehensions – and, at certain times and places, simply to keep one's head. People in the mass are xenophobic and hate that which they do not understand. If you have found a pearl, you do not throw it to the pigs, 'lest they turn and rend you'.

Silence was maintained with such admirable strictness in antiquity that the inquisitive researcher can discover very little of what went on in the rituals of these religions. The only things that were committed to writing were those which might be generally published; of the rest, memory was the best vault and silence the best guardian. But the most eloquent language of the Mysteries is not verbal but symbolic. Symbols elude the limiting precision of words, a precision which pins the ideas like butterflies to a single plane, while they should be free to flutter up and down all the levels of being and of meaning. It follows that in this book many of the visual images are susceptible to a multitude of interpretations, of which only one is suggested in the caption. The continual shifting of levels and of perspectives, which may at first seem capricious, is a deliberate exercise in expanding the mental response to symbolism.

The plates divide the subject according to the different religions, sects or cults, as they are usually studied by scholars. If one surveys them from a broader viewpoint, certain basic spiritual attitudes or orientations emerge, and these are described in the sections on the five Paths below. These five Paths are not peculiar to the period in question – they would mean little if they were. One or more of them is to be found in every human aspiration, no matter of what epoch or race. It is because they lead their followers along these archetypal paths that the Mystery religions are both justifiable and comprehensible.

The Path of the Warrior

Soldiering is not at present a reality to most people in the English-speaking world, especially those of the younger generation who have been spared the direct experience of warfare in their lifetimes. War for us, at the time of writing at least, is something that happens in the Third World. The ever-present threat of nuclear destruction under which we live is the very antithesis of hand-to-hand fighting with sharp weapons such as the ancients knew. Ancient societies, on the other hand, were intimate with war. Greek and Roman civilization had always been conducted on the assumption that this was part of life, as much as seed-time and harvest. War happened in between the two: while the crops were growing one went on campaign into the surrounding countryside, and fought with one's neighbours. Some men never returned, and that was as much to be expected as natural death. Others came home with booty and slaves, and that was good. War is always good for somebody, and bad for somebody else. So the soldier's outlook is always a dualistic one, or if you insist a selfish one. His whole object is to vanquish the opposition; and for this to be any sort of life for a man he has to have some belief in the validity and worth of his own cause. Even a motive so ignoble as racial superiority will serve: the soldier may feel perfectly justified in exterminating or enslaving a race or group he considers inferior for cultural or moral reasons, just as a gardener plucks out weeds so that more useful or beautiful plants may flourish in the same soil. No doubt the Germanic tribes and the Roman legionaries each felt this way about the other.

Belief in a cause is very easily transposed from a pragmatic to an idealistic level, and it does not take long for abstract concepts like Justice, Truth and Righteousness to be appropriated to one's own side. Given the trend in the ancient world towards personification, the virtues take on the personae of gods and goddesses, and instantly the hosts of heaven are enlisted to one's cause. Athena supported the Greeks as Hera did the Trojans, and the great Zeus himself was not indifferent to the outcome of a battle between mortals. The Dioscuri were glimpsed fighting alongside the Roman troops at Lake Regillus in c. 496 B.C., just as the Angels of Mons appeared to the Allies in 1914. Prayers and sacrifices are offered up to ensure divine co-operation, for i The Emperor Commodus as Hercules. Statue, c. AD 192. Rome, Capitoline Museum.

'if God be for us, who can be against us?' The Crusaders set off with a high Mass to fight the enemies of Christ, while the Moslems trust in Allah to give them victory over the idolaters and polytheists. If war were not such a cruel business, one would have to laugh. But that were to take a God's-eye view. Let us consider rather what warfare, holy and otherwise, means to the individual soldier, and how it may actually constitute a valid spiritual path.

A soldier is called upon to hazard his bodily safety in the interests of a superior cause: for his country, his loved ones, his faith or his king. That means that he must place a higher value on these than on his person. He must also obey orders, submitting his own will to that of his officers. He accepts a life far removed from the comforts of home and family, and even though he hopes to return to them the richer for his exploits, he knows he may die and never see them again, or return maimed. All of this amounts to a powerful lesson in self-abasement. However arrogant the soldier may be on the surface, he surrenders his own individuality as soon as he dons his uniform and faces on the battlefield the possibility of his own annihilation. He comes very close to the mystery of death, and even if he appears none the wiser for it, it is a lesson for his soul that may bear fruit in time to come.

Some people are destined to live their whole lives within this context, and they are the world's warrior-caste whose job it is to rule and protect the people. Their calling is utterly different from that of the other traditional castes – priests and teachers, merchants and peasants – and different ethics apply to them as a result. When faced with the choice of killing or being killed, the perfect ascetic would give up his life; but the warrior should hit his adversary first! Most of the world's religions have made room for this attitude. The Japanese Samurai, the holy warriors Mohammed and Arjuna, the Knights of the Round Table: all are followers of this path.

In the case of Christianity there is an obvious disparity between Jesus's own pacifism and the behaviour of his followers. For some time before Jesus, the Essene brotherhood had followed ethical principles of the most rigorous kind, and if Jesus was, as seems likely, raised and educated by them, it is no surprise that his attitudes reflect their non-resistant ethics. Had these ethics continued to be the only acceptable ones for Church members, however, then Christianity would have remained, like the Essenes, an idiosyncratic Judaic sect. It would have had nothing to offer those whose nature and disposition prevents them from embracing this particular morality. Jesus had to be Lord of the warriors, the merchants and the peasants as well as of the ascetics. 'Gentle Jesus, meek and mild' therefore became, as Christianity developed, also the terrible Judge of the World and General of the Church Militant, protecting his own flock like a Good Shepherd but disposing of his enemies with a soldier's forthrightness in the holocaust of Hell. Every Christian soldier could then identify with Jesus as Lord of the Last Judgment, and feel that he was doing his part in destroying the adversaries of his God – even if they also called themselves Christians.

Christianity was not the only cult thus to broaden its original base. The religion of Isis, which appealed in Imperial times largely to city-dwellers and middle-class women, welcomed Lucius (in Apuleius, Metamorphoses xi, 15) with the words: 'Enrol yourself in this holy military service.' But the allegiance of the actual warriors was more usually to the overtly military gods: Mars, Hercules, Sol Invictus, Jupiter Dolichenus, and especially Mithras. Mithraism was based on a real warrior's world-view. It imagined a supreme Lord of Light, powerful beyond any cosmos known to man, constantly opposed by the supreme Dark Lord Ahriman. Thus to the Mithraist the whole universe is in a perpetual state of warfare between the ultimately good and the ultimately evil. Mithras is a lower god whom Ormuzd sent to lead the side of the good within our cosmos – hence the Zodiac which often surrounds him and his acts. All of life is a battle, continuing even after death as devils and angels vie for possession of our souls. So war between humans is only to be expected as an image of the cosmic and even metacosmic strife. Outwardly, a soldier of Mithras must ally his energies and aspirations with the side of the angels. Inwardly he must make his life a continuous re-enactment of the creative bull-sacrifice (see illustration), mortifying the merely physical, symbolized by the bull, so that the life-giving spirit may flow forth more abundantly.

ii Mithras slaying the Bull.
Statue from Rome, early second century A.D. London,
British Museum.

The simile of a soldier rising from the ranks through successive promotions could aptly be applied to the series of initiatic grades which Mithraism and the other Mystery religions offered their devotees. The warrior would hope to develop in the course of initiations an increasing detachment from personal concerns and from fear, and a capacity to make reliable but rapid decisions on matters of life and death. As a modern 'warrior path' one could cite Freemasonry, always strong in the Armed Forces, with its typical stress on the military virtues of brotherhood and loyalty, its secret and sometimes daunting initiations, its system of degrees and the formidable political power which it has exercised behind the scenes of history. And as a path on the individual level, rather than the collective one, there is the complex of Martial Arts which have long been cultivated in the Far East. These take the necessities of a warrior's existence as the basis for developing spiritual qualities, especially that of acting at lightning speed on the strength of intuition rather than thought. Extrapolating from what is known of these modern phenomena, one may approach in imagination the ancient military cults.

Life on earth, according to the Perennial Philosophy, is like a school in which human souls are subjected to various tests, some of a more or less painful nature; and it is only through these experiences or initiations that progress can be made. Not only the conscious aspirant but every person alive or dead is engaged on the Herculean task of raising himself from the status of an animal to that of a god. Sometimes the tests, and the changes in consciousness which they demand, come quietly. Sometimes they occur purely on a mental level. But at other times, and especially when the person is in some way dense or insensitive, they will descend and take the form of physical accident or illness. Then a battle ensues between the forces of healing and those that seek to destroy the body. Exactly so in the collectivity: there are social and cultural changes that are inevitable 'initiations' of mankind. If they are accepted, they can take place peacefully and progress will be smooth. If they are resisted, they will come all the same, but will occur on a physical level as war or bloody revolution.

The period under scrutiny – the first four or five centuries A.D. – saw changes of both kinds. Perhaps the most far-reaching result was the extension throughout the Empire of the privilege of Roman citizenship, with all the encouragement this gave people to see themselves as individual members of a vast family, rather than as unconscious fragments of a tribe or provincial race. This step was achieved partly by peaceful acquiescence, partly by forcible conquest. Nowadays we are facing a similar prospect, only on a global scale, with the same options.

When change has to happen in a violent way, the instigator may be a kind of avatar or divine incarnation of a minor order, charged like a surgeon with the distasteful task of operating on the body politic. He may be chosen for his manipulative skill, as it were, rather than for any conscious understanding of the matter in hand. The Emperor Julian, for example, understood very well the profound spiritual currents of his age, and tried to reverse them without success: he was not a practical man. Alexander the Great, on the other hand (who with good reason was one of Julian's heroes), was supremely practical, yet confessed that he was not his own master. When questioned by the Indian Brahmins on why he persisted in waging war, he replied as follows:

It is ordained by heavenly Providence that we should be servants of the gods' decree. The sea does not rise in waves unless the wind blows, nor is the tree set in motion unless the wind touches it; so also man does not act unless he is impelled by the heavenly Providence. I would willingly desist from making war, but the Lord of my spirit does not suffer me to do so. For if all were of one mind, the cosmos would stand still . . . (Pseudo-Callisthenes 3, 6)

He might have been speaking for the human race as a whole.

iii The Emperor as Cosmic Victor. The 'Ludovisi' Sarcophagus of Hostilianus, AD 251. Rome, National Museum.

The Path of the Monk

The monk's path, like the warrior's, is based on a dualistic vision of the cosmos. The essential difference lies in this: while the warrior's enemy is without, the monk's lies within himself. Of course this does not prevent an ascetic (like the Ayatollah Khomeini) from seeing Satan incarnate in his fellow men, any more than it prevents a warrior (like T. E. Lawrence or the ideal Mithraist) from being a master of self-denial. All these 'paths' are extremes, and most people's aspirations lie along more than one of them.

Fundamental to the monk's attitude is a duality of spirit and matter, which is manifested in the human being as a gulf between soul and body. It is the ascetic's view that the spirit or soul has become entangled in the material world, or in the human body, and that it is the purpose of religion to free it. For the Orphics and Pythagoreans, our existence on earth is forced upon us as expiation of our sins. It is a terrible thing for one's soul to be imprisoned in the physical body: no wonder new-born babies cry. When the disciples of the great Indian sage, Ramana Maharshi, wanted to celebrate his birthday, the master said: 'On one's birthday one should mourn one's entry into this world' (Collected Works, p. 137).

For all the philosophers of the Pythagorean-Platonic-Hermetic tradition, the situation is the same. The universe is a hierarchy of different states of being, of which the very lowest is our tangible world and the things made of its four elements: earth, water, air and fire. Everything in this region, the sphere beneath the Moon, is imperfect and subject to pain, suffering, decay and death. Beyond, in the ethereal spheres of the planets, we would find progressively purer states, and above the fixed stars is the realm of the gods where perfection reigns – at least from our point of view. The higher or Rational Soul in man belongs to that realm and knows it as its home; but here on earth it is stifled, sunk in the intractable clay of our physical frame. The ascetic's task is to release it, and he does this by wearing away, by one means or another, the prison of flesh and blood.

iv Hor, a Priest of Thoth.
Basalt statue from Alexandria, early first century AD (?)
Cairo, National Museum.

Profane people mistakenly love their bodies, ignorant of the divine spark that lies captive therein. They delight in pampering their bodies with food and drink, and in clothing them with cosmetics and raiment. They take pride in that of which they ought to be most ashamed. Thus the monk thinks as he watches worldly folk. He, on the other hand, has made a commitment to release himself from these vanities. His road is asceticism, and it differs little whether he be an Egyptian priest (see illustration, p. 16), a Christian nun or monk, a Jewish Essene or a member of the Pythagorean brotherhood.

Ascesis consists in the relinquishing of one pleasure in the hope of gaining a greater one. The weight-watcher renounces certain foods for the greater delight of being slim. The vegetarian does so for the higher ideal of humanitarianism. And the monk fasts for the joy of release from bondage to the stomach's demands – and, no doubt, for the pleasant 'high' that prolonged abstinence brings. Fasting strengthens the will and purifies the body. Like all asceticisms, it may be taken to extremes. The medieval Cathars of Montailou, when they felt death approaching, would sometimes start the endura, the fast unto death, refusing all nourishment. To maintain such a vow to the end was a highly respected achievement, and deemed a great benefit to the soul. In the more sophisticated environment of the ancient Essenes, a similar practice was usual among the very old who no longer desired life. After bidding farewell to the community they would go alone into a deserted place where there was water, carrying with them a bunch of grapes. Each day they would eat a few grapes, and when those were gone they would drink only water, spending their time in spiritual exercises until a peaceful death supervened. What a contrast to the struggles of modern medicine to keep us alive at any price!

The Essenes and the Pythagoreans were supposed to be vegetarians, though in the case of the latter it is doubtful that all schools followed the master's example. Apart from the obvious motive of compassion towards one's fellow creatures, vegetarianism has also the purpose of purifying the body from the contaminations of flesh foods. Purification, however, could incur dietary rules of a quite different sort. The Neoplatonic Emperor Julian was not a vegetarian, but he refrained from root vegetables because they bring into the body a downward tendency [Rudolf Steiner would have said the opposite]; from apples for they are too holy; from the pomegranate because it belongs to the Underworld; from dates because they are too solar; from fish because they are not usually sacrificed to the gods, and anyway come from too deep down; and from pigs because they are coarse, earthly, vile creatures, only offered to the chthonic gods (Orations v, 175-7).

The idea of contamination also extends to the company of other humans. Any sensitive person who does not habitually live in a large modern city knows what psychic contamination is, and feels it when in such a hive of humanity. The Desert Fathers put not only the temptations of the city but all human contact behind them as they went off to face themselves and their God. Their physical courage in a wilderness full of dangers was only exceeded by the mental and emotional stamina with which they encountered what they knew as demonic forces – no matter that we might call them projections from the darker realms of the psyche. St Anthony emerged from his ordeal 'as one initiated into sacred Mysteries', with knowledge of the unseen world and power over it (Athanasius, Vita S. Antonii 14). Such men did not need the formal initiations of the Mystery cults: they had passed the same gates on their own.

Many of the cults made use of mild asceticism for the benefit of those who were content to live, for the most part, a worldly life. Lucius had to abstain from meat, wine and sexual intercourse for the ten days preceding his initiation into the Mysteries of Osiris (Metamorphoses xi, 28), and Propertius complains that his Cynthia is observing a similar period of chastity in preparation for the rites of Isis (Elegy 33). Traditional Catholicism continued in this practice with the regular fasts throughout the Church's year, and restrictions on the timing and nature of sexual activity, while the making of retreats is a universal religious observance, giving the advantages of a temporary monasticism.

It is chastity above all that distinguishes the monk's life from that of lay people. If he considers birth a tragedy, then the logical response is to avoid causing the fall of other human souls into bodies. Some later Gnostics renounced reproduction altogether, as did the American Shakers in the nineteenth century – and quickly became extinct. But there is another, personal side to chastity. The power to reproduce one's kind is a marvellous and magical power, and it can be harnessed to other ends. Sexual energy, as the Indian yogis know, is one manifestation of that greater creative energy which can bring about a spiritual birth in higher worlds if it is not used up for pleasure and reproduction in this world. It is this knowledge, generalized and wrongly applied, that has given many un-ascetic religious people their sheepish attitude towards sex. St Paul tells the Corinthians (I: 7, 9) that 'it is better to marry than to burn' – better still not to need to marry. The sublimated urges of fanatical monks have been spent in tyranny of their fellows as often as they have lifted them above earthly desires.

The belief that sex is a hindrance to spiritual achievement, taken naïvely, led in ancient times to the grotesque extreme of voluntary castration. The enlightened Christian Father Origen tried this in his youth in the hope of escaping from his desires, and lived to see that it was not the way: indeed, it is specifically forbidden to Christians. Not so to the followers of Cybele and Attis, whose eunuch priests, the Galli, were the most notorious practitioners of this parody of continence (see illustration). Perhaps today's 'transsexuals' are reincarnations of these fanatics, who after their castration would adopt feminine costume and extravagant adornments. The Emperor Domitian in the first century AD made castration a capital crime, but did not succeed in preventing the practice any more than Hadrian, who tried to prohibit circumcision: a symbolic substitute used by ancient Egyptians and Arabs as well as Jews. The Emperor Elagabalus, keen to embrace every cult, is said to have circumcised himself and refrained from eating pork; he further planned to honour the Great Mother by having himself castrated, but either did not live long enough, or changed his mind when he decided to violate a Vestal Virgin. Some of his followers went to the uttermost extreme of renunciation in hurling their most beautiful children to the wild beasts in his temple.

It is sometimes difficult, in the world of ascetics, to distinguish sober purification from wilful self-punishment. Juvenal mocks the women devotees of Isis who stand in the icy Tiber or crawl on bleeding knees to her temple (Satire 6, 522–6). Herodotus, at the Isis festival in Busiris, witnessed myriads of people in orgiastic flagellation (History ii, 61). The Gallus in the plate holds a fierce-looking whip in his left hand. The theme of mortification of the flesh runs throughout Christian monasticism: from St Jerome in the desert, beating his breast with a stone, through Savonarola's hair-shirt, to the little scourges issued to modern nuns. And were not the tortures of the Inquisition a forced asceticism, a monstrous perversion of the theme that the body must suffer if the soul is to go free?

v A 'Gallus', Eunuch Priest of the Great Mother. Relief from the Appian Way, mid-second century AD. Rome, Capitoline Museum.

The Path of the Magician

The magician's attitude to the gulf between body and spirit is to unite them. A believer, like the monk, in a hierarchical universe of which our earth is the lowest level, he does not try to abandon or deny the physical world and body: he uses them. Mindful of the axiom of Hermes Trismegistus, patron of magical arts: 'Whatever is above is like to that below: and whatever is below is like to that above', he respects the correspondences and similarities between all levels of the universe. He knows that man is a microcosm, and that even his physical frame is made, in some sense, in God's image. All the levels of existence mirror one another in structure. When the structures are set in motion, a similar movement is felt throughout the hierarchy.

The most obvious example of this world-view is astrology, which assumes that the movements of the planets are reflected in world events and in the human psyche. A fatalistic believer in astrology resigns himself to an ineluctable destiny, deeming himself no more capable of opposition to the planets than the magnetic needle is able to point away from the North Pole. But the magician, by contrast, exploits the system of correspondences, knowing that their 'causality', if such it be, works in both directions. Whatever is done on earth is mirrored in the heavens: and who can say which is cause, and which effect? Magic is the science of affecting the unseen worlds through operations conducted on this one.

The commonest form of magic practised in the ancient world was animal sacrifice. Regarded from the point of view of a simple-minded worshipper, the victim's life-force is offered as a kind of food to the god. (Usually the body would be divided between donor and clergy, and eaten: complete incineration was exceptional.) Such a gift incurred an obligation on the god's part, or at least encouraged reciprocal favours. As Porphyry categorizes it, sacrifice can be made for three purposes: homage, necessity or gratitude, and none are really disinterested. Regarded esoterically, however, the picture is a little different. Animal sacrifice affects not the true gods, but the sublunary elementals: invisible spirits who throng the earth's atmosphere and live on matter of an etheric kind. They may, under certain circumstances, render services to men, but they are tricky characters, at best indifferent to humans, and not to be relied upon. Hence Christians shunned them, and refused any part in the animal slaughter which attracts them. Constantine offered God only flowers and incense, and Theodosius, in his edicts of AD 391, made sacrifice illegal throughout the Empire. Some contemporary pagan philosophers, notably Porphyry (De Abstinencia ii, 12), also renounced animal killing, thinking that it cannot possibly affect the gods, that its consequences are not favourable to humans.

A special case of sacrifice, and one that belongs to another category of magic, was the taurobolium, already mentioned above. In this ritual bull-slaughter, the vital forces of the bull are poured out with the blood over the devotee. Extraordinary power was attributed to this act, and those who had undergone the experience were celebrated as 'eternally reborn'. The taurobolium began as an ordinary bull-sacrifice, common in the ancient world (cf. Homer's 'hecatombs of vi Triple Hecate. Miniature bronze altar for use in sympathetic magic. From Pergamum, AD 200–50. Berlin. Staatliche Museen.

vii Phallic Tintinnabulum.
Bronze from Pompeii, c. first century AD. London, British Museum.

oxen'), but took on a more religious slant in the second century AD when the bull's blood was distributed in a kind of communion to the faithful. At the same time the genitals were removed and specially buried: and this connects with the rites of the Great Mother Cybele, recalling and perhaps re-enacting the castration of Attis (see Chapter X). The full ritual, established c. AD 300, was intended to transmute the physical strength of the bull into psychic energy for the benefit of the participant or for another assigned by him. Here are two of the fundamental aspects of later magic: the harnessing of the energy inherent in blood, and of sexual energy, for defensive, offensive or sublimatory purposes. The phallic form of many ancient charms (see illustration) is similarly a means of bringing the creative and essentially positive power of Nature to aid against the entropic and destructive designs of 'evil' forces.

The last taurobolium in Rome was celebrated in the late fourth century AD, on the site now occupied by St Peter's. But ritual bull-sacrifice was a regular practice in the more remote areas of Thrace, in northern Greece, well on into the twentieth century. Kakouri (see Bibliography) tells of the nominally Christian body of initiates who, under the patronage of Saints Helena and Constantine still preside there over fire-walking and phallic fertility dramas. In their bull-sacrifice, the unblemished victim had to come of his own free will, and after the slaughter his flesh was partly consumed raw. In a poor society such as existed in Thrace and much of the ancient world, most of the meat ever eaten must have been butchered at sacrifices: Homer's heroes only enjoy it on such occasions. The modern person who reacts with distaste to the idea of animal sacrifice might reflect on the dignity and respect paid to the victim, and to the spiritual intentions surrounding the ceremony, in contrast to the degrading and godless slaughtering practised today.

Some pagans defended sacrifice, while recognizing that it cannot possibly affect the eternal gods. Sallust admitted that they gain nothing from it, but that we gain everything (On the Gods 15). Julian encouraged it in his pagan revival, along with the reverence of statues of the gods, as conducive to piety, considering the subjective state of the worshipper to be its justification. One should be eager to offer up one's best to the gods, he said, just as one should delight in seeing their images (Against the Galilaeans 347C; Letters 293C-D). But representations of the gods are not mere reminders: like the relics of saints and heroes, they have as their purpose the drawing down of celestial influences. The magical charm shown here (see illustration) was worn for protection against the Evil Eye, just like the blue glass charms and medals of saints sold around the Mediterranean today. And the Hecate plaque (see illustration, p. 23) served like a modern radionic device to direct invisible influences on to whatever was placed on the little table in the middle – perhaps a lock of hair, or fingernail, as in witchcraft. The magic used here was probably ‘grey’, if not actually black.

To distinguish white magic from black, one must ask whether it is the intention of the magical act to elevate the lower towards a higher plane or goal, or else to exploit the higher forces in order to obtain advantages on the lower level. Apuleius started out meddling with the inferior sort, and got into trouble which he describes in his Apology, but then rose to the higher magic of theurgy. A theurgist is a magician who seeks through his knowledge to align earthly things with the divine order, so that ‘Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.’ But he cannot join two things so far apart without an intermediary. The late antique theurgists did not believe that they were actually contacting, much less commanding, the gods themselves. They knew that they were dealing with the good daemons who fill the links in the chain of being between gods and men. These daemons partake of the characteristics of the gods to which they themselves are devoted, and hence serve as channels for the different divine forces to descend to earth. They like to be addressed by the names of their archetypal divinities, and they respond only to absolutely correct procedures. As Iamblichus says, to get the slightest detail of an incantation or ceremony wrong can invalidate the entire operation. One might as well try to give a concert with one lyre-string broken (De Mysteriis v, 21). The same situation is well known today in the form of ‘natural magic’ which we prefer to call experimental science.

The Christian magical rites – the seven sacraments – are essentially acts of theurgy, in which something on the physical plane (bread, oil, a ring, etc.) is manipulated with certain spoken formulae in order to make changes occur on an invisible or ‘subtle’ plane. Clairvoyants say that changes happen there with an ease and a rapidity denied to physical matter. What is affected is primarily the subtle bodies of the participants, with the object in view being ideally not material gain but perfection. Through the subtly transmuted elements of water, bread and wine, the Christian sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist are believed to draw down the forces of Christ into the souls of the participants. This direct contact with the god is something foreign to the magician, but nothing less is attempted by those on the more direct Path of Love.

viii Talisman against the Evil Eye. (top) ‘Solomon’ kills a she-devil. (above) Four beasts attack the Eye. Bronze pendant, before AD 325. University of Pennsylvania Museum.

The Path of Love

Just as the magician sees all the levels of the universe linked by a chain of correspondences, the person of the Path of Love sees them joined by mutual affection. According to his world-view, God so loves the world that he or she sends the divine influences down into its very depths, cherishing every creature with a more than motherly love (see illustration). Conversely, man can so love God that he is raised to divine union. The ultimate object is 'nothing else than existing in God himself' (St Gregory of Nyssa). Like all human beings, the devotee starts out on his path sundered from his object of adoration, and his lifelong aspiration is towards closing the gap. In the end the lover is no longer distinct from the beloved, the two are become one, and the difference in levels is transcended. This is fully as miraculous as the magical joining of heaven and earth: even more so, since the magician has the benefit of a scientific system, while the lover works only with the power within his own soul. He is nothing, God is everything, as he seeks the absorption of the part into the whole, of the human fragment into the One. A Hermetic fragment puts the idea of union very vividly: 'Come into me, Hermes, as children come into women's wombs. I know thee, Hermes, and thou knowest me: I am thou, and thou art I . . .' (Kenyon, Greek Papyri, I, p. 116).

But these are the higher flights of advanced mystics who have no need for an anthropomorphic intermediary between themselves and the Divine. Most devotees address an image of the god, made with hands or the inner eye, and conceive him or her as having at least some human traits: hence the many saviours and heroes described in these pages. Unlike the gods of Olympus, the Mystery gods have usually suffered pain, loss or death, and this gives them compassion for our own sufferings and joys. Osiris, Orpheus, Hercules, Christ, Dionysus, Attis and Adonis were all slain and resurrected. But of all the gods of the Mystery religions, perhaps the best-loved was Isis – loved for her warm humanity and for incarnating all the best aspects of woman as lover, wife, mother and widow. Apuleius or his fictional character Lucius, on renouncing his debauched past, recognizes the true consummation of eros in mystic union with her, and devotes himself ix Isis nursing Horus.

Terracotta from Herculaneum,
c. first century A.D. Naples, National Museum.

x Dionysian Revelry. Painting from the Tomb of the Nasomii, Rome, later third century A.D. London, British Museum.

to her service much as a medieval knight would swear fealty to the Virgin Mary. In her epiphany to him, she assures him that she is everything and everywhere: 'You will worship me even in Hades' (Metamorphoses xi, 6). All the Mystery gods descended to the underworld, too, to redeem those incarcerated there. The same idea occurs in the Buddhist system, where every world, even Hell, contains a Boddhisattva. Nowhere in the universe is love absent from him who truly opens himself to it.

Isis was an indulgent mistress, imposing no particular morality beyond the natural inclinations of good men. 'Love, and do what thou wilt' might have been her motto, for love will turn all to good. But those on the Path of Love often become acutely aware of the impurity and unworthiness of the human state, and are hence drawn also to the path of purification and asceticism. They then manifest a blend of self-denial and adoration such as was later to become so characteristic of Christian saints.

If one had to single out one paramount feature that distinguished all the Mystery cults from other religions of their period, it would be that they sought a personal relationship with their gods. Consequently the attitude of their devotees to the gods was one of love rather than of fear or indifferent manipulation. The motive of much primitive religion seems to be to get rid of the gods, and by fair means or foul to prevent them from troubling mankind. For the Mystery religions the motive is quite the contrary: it is to get closer to them, recognizing them as man's best friends. The Maenads of Dionysus (see illustration) are more than that even: the god is their lover. One of the tasks of Christ was to open this path of direct intimacy with God to every person without distinction, cutting through the barriers of race and class like many of the cults contemporary with him.

The path of loving devotion to the gods does not necessarily call for any external ceremonies or human intermediaries, but in actual practice it is usually combined with one or more of the other paths, and rituals and initiations are used to further the progress of the aspirant. One such means, not in any way peculiar to Christianity, is holy communion, in which the goal of assimilation to the god on his level is furthered by assimilation of him on this plane. Dionysus was believed to be present, not merely symbolically but actually, in the wine and raw flesh which his devotees consumed. A Persian Mithraic text, amazingly reminiscent of Jesus's words, states that 'he who will not eat of my body and drink of my blood, so that he will be made one with me and I with him, the same shall not know salvation.' The initiates of Cybele and Attis had some form of communion, too, for they declared: 'I have eaten from the tambourine: I have drunk from the cymbal' – the instruments sacred to them – but what they ate or drank we do not know.

Another aspect of communion is that as a sacred meal it prefigures the celestial banquet which the blessed are thought to enjoy in heaven, in the eternal presence of Christ, Serapis, Mithras, or other banqueting saviours. Some of the Mysteries went further to anticipate the ambience of heaven by inducing unworldly states. Wine probably affected the ancients far more powerfully than it does us (they seldom drank it unmixed with water), but even the sober Plato allows intoxication at the Dionysian festivals (Laws 775B): 'Rather the madness of the god than the sobriety of men' (Phaedrus 244D). In the Mysteries, all five senses might be elevated through wine, music, lights, incense and sexuality, to say nothing of drugs, in order to create an unforgettable experience and encourage hopes of heavenly bliss. According to the Platonic view, the things and people that we love on earth are sent us for the same reason: we love them because they remind our souls of the paradise from which we came, and to which we may eventually return. The Neoplatonists applied this doctrine to mythology in order to justify the love-life of the gods. The abduction of the Leucippid women by the Dioscuri (see illustration), for example, denotes the seizure of the soul by the irresistible forces of divine love, after which its sole joy is to live in the house of the Lord for ever.

When Christ urged his followers to 'hate' their human relations before they could become his disciples (Luke 14, 26), he was likewise demanding that they transfer their earthly affections to a divine xi Abduction of a Leucippid.

Stucco decoration, first century
A.D. Rome, Porta Maggiore
Basilica.

object. Far from inducing hatred, this only serves to make a person more loving in his transactions with mankind, for he now shares in the reciprocal action of the gods' love for all men. So Christ in his Sermon on the Mount (see illustration) could equally well say, 'Love your enemies' (Matthew 5, 44). Nearly all religions admit that there are beings in the universe who have reached a stage of spiritual evolution inconceivable to us, some of whom make it their work to help lower creatures such as mankind. The Christ was one; the Bodhisattvas of Buddhism and the Avatars of the Hindus are others. Out of compassion and truly divine love they may descend to this and other earths and take on the burden of a human body. For such beings, physical incarnation is a veritable crucifixion: a nailing of their divinity to the fourfold cross of the elements. This is the esoteric meaning of Christ's love for us, and of his symbolic death on the cross.

xii Christ preaching the Sermon on the Mount. Sarcophagus from Vigna Maccarani, c. AD 270-310. Rome, National Museum.

The Path of Knowledge

When the goal of love is consummated, what is left? Perfect knowledge that is at once possession and being. You are what you know. Knowledge, even on a mundane level, involves the actual taking of the object into oneself. On a mystical level this process is felt as the dissolution of difference between subject and object: the two become one single self-knowing act. The person on the Path of Love experiences this with an emotional colouring – which in turn is part of the knowledge. Ultimately, all paths bring knowledge to those who tread them: whatever their effect in the world outside, their inner purpose is to bring man closer to the knowledge of God. The warrior and the monk, each in his way, allies himself with the side of what he sees as the Divine, rejecting all else, that he may more closely know that to which he belongs. The magician strives to know God's mind as it is exteriorized in the cosmic patterns. Philo says that man reaches out to God through mediators: the Logos and Angelic Powers – but that ultimately man is allied to God himself through his Intellect. He means by this term not the logical mind, but the 'Rational Soul' of the Platonists, the Hindus' Buddhi: a fragment of the divine nature itself which enables man to rise in his higher understanding to the very throne of God. 'When the soul that loves God searches into the nature of the Existent, it enters into a search for the formless and the invisible. The greatest thing it understands from this is the comprehension that God is incomprehensible and the vision that he is invisible' (De Posteritate Caini 15).

The knowledge gained by those enlightened beings who have risen so far is not expressible in human language. But there are lower stages on the Path of Knowledge which are a preparation for the ultimate experiences. Plutarch says that

A desire for the truth, especially about the gods, is in reality a yearning for the Deity. For the study and the search is a reception, as it were, of things sacred – an occupation more pious than any practice of abstinence or service in a temple, but particularly well pleasing to this goddess [Isis] whom you worship, for she is both exceedingly wise and a lover of wisdom. (De Iside et Osiride 2) xiii The Philosopher Plotinus.

Supposed portrait from Ostia,
c. AD 260. Ostia, Museo Ostiense.

Plutarch's near contemporary Philo Judaeus describes from his own experience how wisdom of a higher order can unexpectedly descend on the student:

Sometimes I have approached my work empty, and suddenly become full, the ideas falling in a shower from above and being sown invisibly, so that under the influence of the Divine possession I have been filled with corybantic fury and been unconscious of anything: place, persons, myself, words spoken, lines written. For I obtained language, ideas, an enjoyment of light, keenest vision, pellucid distinction of objects, such as might be reached through the eyes as the result of hypernormal clarity. (De Migratione Abrahami 35)

The Path of Knowledge is through study and meditation. What is studied is for the most part the findings of those who have progressed further than the student. In the ancient world this path was followed primarily by those in philosophical schools such as Plato's Academy in Athens (which was not closed until AD 529), the circle of Plotinus (see illustration, p. 30) in Rome, and the Alexandrian Neopythagorean, Neoplatonic and Gnostic schools. Unlike the Peripatetics, Stoics and Epicureans, these students accepted the existence of revealed doctrines and revered certain of their masters as recipients of a higher learning inaccessible to the logical mind. Philo speaks of how the spirit of a Prophet can be replaced, temporarily or permanently, by the Divine Spirit. Plutarch, writing on the nature of Socrates' inspiration, explained that his daemon was, unlike ours, a pure one, able to hear the divine message. The daemon of Plotinus was similarly said to be an entity of the order of gods, giving him direct access to higher knowledge. St Gregory sensed in Origen the voice not of a human being but of the 'Angel of the Great Counsel'. And the Pythagoreans believed their master to be an incarnation of Apollo. Early Christian art, shunning altogether the subject of the Crucifixion, often shows Jesus as the teacher of his disciples, passing on the Word of God (see illustration), reminding us of the Gnostic tradition that there was a secret dimension to his teachings which was reserved for the closer disciples, and thus assimilating Jesus to the tradition of inspired philosophical teachers.

In antiquity there was another avenue to divine knowledge open to the earnest aspirant, and that was the Mysteries themselves. In Greece there had been an initiatic institution at Eleusis at least since the eighth century BC, with both Greater and Lesser Mysteries. It is gratifying to reflect that modern scholars still do not know what went on in these ceremonies, so well was secrecy maintained for over a thousand years of annual celebration. According to occultists, the function of all

Lesser Mysteries, or equally of the lower grades of initiation, was to impart information on the nature of higher worlds, while that of Greater Mysteries was to bring about direct contact with the beings who inhabit them. Some scholars imagine the Mysteries of Eleusis and other institutions to have been merely a sacred drama played by actors to fill an impressionable audience with holy dread. Yet the architecture of the great hall at Eleusis, the Telesterion, certainly precludes this: the room was filled with pillars. On the other hand, the great number of lesser initiates there ruled out individual treatment. Something can only have happened on the psychic plane which touched every person present: a collective vision which left an unforgettable impression. The Eleusinian symbolism of corn, pomegranates and poppies (see illustration p. 34) refers to the unseen forces which affect mankind via the vegetable kingdom, building the body and informing the mind. The intuitive grasp of this relationship, in all its wonder and complexity, was summarized in the famous climax of xiv Christ as a Philosophical Teacher. Ivory plaque, fourth century A.D. Brescia, Museo Civico.

xv The Poppy as Mediator between Earth and Heaven. Vase from Apulia, fourth century B.C. Vatican Museum.

the Mystery, so disappointing to non-initiates: the displaying of an ear of wheat. Certain information was also given at Eleusis by word of mouth, including the 'password to the Paradise of Demeter' to be used after death. In the Lesser Mysteries of other gods, it is suggested that the fact of heliocentricity was revealed. Jewish esotericism includes the teaching of reincarnation. So Lesser Mysteries give the initiates theoretical knowledge which changes their whole view of man and the cosmos, and stands them in better stead when they have to leave this world for the unknown. Nowadays this information is available freely, and each person can decide whether or not to make the change from accepted attitudes which constitutes the first initiation.

The Greater Mysteries, or higher grades of initiation, were conducted individually rather than collectively. The initiations of Isis were given to those priests or laity selected by the goddess through having had significant dreams. Sometimes the dream itself might be the initiation: the late Platonist Damascius dreamed: 'I had become Attis and the Great Mother was celebrating the Hilaria [feast of Cybele] in my honour' (Vita Isidori 131). From this he acquired the certitude of eternal salvation.

But the primary object of these initiations was to take the candidate through the gates of death. The hierophant told Apuleius before his initiation that it was like a voluntary death followed by a slow recovery. Plutarch, conversely, said that when death comes it is like initiation into the Greater Mysteries (see quotation below). As in shamanic, Masonic, and other later initiations, the candidate was placed in a trance, his consciousness taken out of his body, and in this state he experienced higher states of being and met some of the denizens of the invisible worlds. Some were demonic, others beneficent; Proclus describes certain of them as forms of light that take on human shape (In Rempublicam i, 110–11). Through direct experience the candidate would learn that he could live freely without his physical body, and that the gods he worshipped were perfectly real. Then he would return to earth fully convinced of his immortality and prepared to meet death fearlessly, knowing it as the gate to freedom and his soul's true home.

Since earthly life is so short and its limitations so unsatisfactory, it is not surprising that the Mystery religions were largely concerned with what happens afterwards. They sought to give foreknowledge of the posthumous state, in order to save souls from the confusion they would otherwise face on entering the immaterial world. Like the Egyptian and Oriental 'Books of the Dead', they gave instructions for the journey. Our ideas of this journey are of necessity compiled from a large number of fragmentary accounts, some of them seemingly contradictory. This is because the subjective experience of the journey will be different for every person, just as life on earth is differently experienced by everyone. Yet certain features are common to all men. Using the terms of exoteric religion, some Mystery texts describe the soul as first going to Hades, but this underworld is clearly no longer a dark place beneath the earth's surface, as it was in traditional religion (see Cumont in CRAI, 1920, p. 272). The underworld over which Scraapis rules is the lowest of the heavens, i.e. the sphere beneath the Moon. At the gate of Hades, the soul is said to meet its earthly master; alternatively, it may meet a celestial psychopomp such as Hermes, Jesus, Mithras or Anubis, who acts as its guide and guardian. Some form of judgment follows, after which, in abbreviated accounts, the soul proceeds to its appointed place: good souls to blissful union with the gods, bad ones to punishments and both, perhaps, to eventual rebirth on the earth.

In more elaborate accounts of the soul's voyage, it ascends first through the airy regions where it is purified by the action of the winds (Aeneid vi, 740–6). The wind gods, sometimes identified with the Seasons, 'winnow' the soul, refining it until it is fit to continue on its way into more ethereal climes. (This is the significance of the winnowing-basket in Dionysian symbolism.) Plutarch calls this region the Meadows of Hades – evidently the same as the Elysian Fields whence Orpheus fetched Eurydice – and says that the sojourn therein is shorter for the more temperate souls who are less in need of purification (On the Face in the Moon 945). An Orphic sect active from the sixth to the second centuries B.C. buried with its dead gold leaves, on one of which was inscribed the following beautiful description of what to expect in these meadows:

You will find in the well-built dwellings of Hades, on the right, a spring near a white cypress. The souls of the dead go down there seeking refreshment; but do not on any account approach it. You will find another whose chill waters flow from the Lake of Mnemosyne. Before it stand guardians, who will ask you why you come, searching the darkness of Hades. Say to them: 'I am a child of the earth and the starry heaven; I am dried up from thirst and I perish; but give me quickly the cold water which flows from the Lake of Memory.' And being servants of the King of the Underworld, they will have compassion on you and give you to drink of the Lake. And then you can follow on the sacred way the glorious procession of the other Mystai and Bacchoi. (Guarducci, Epigrafia Greca, IV, p. 263)

In a fragment preserved by Stobaeus, Plutarch gives an encapsulated description of the soul's experiences so far:

Thus death and initiation closely correspond. At first there are wanderings and toilsome running about in circles, and journeys through the dark over uncertain roads and dead ends; then, just before the end, there are all kinds of terrors, with shivering, trembling, sweating and utter amazement. After this, a strange and wonderful light meets the wanderer; he is admitted into pure and verdant pastures, where he discerns gentle voices, solemn dances, and the majesty of blessed spirits and sacred visions. Here he is free, being now fully initiated, and walks at liberty like a crowned and dedicated sacrificial victim, joining in the revelry. (Fragment 178, Loeb edition)

For many, this is the end of the journey as they envisage it. But above Hades lie the seven planetary spheres, which must eventually be crossed. These are experienced as obstacles or gates, and the Mystery religions offered special knowledge to assist the soul in passing each one: passwords, formulae, seals. The Mithraists, true to their Manichaean cosmos, imagined that good and evil daemons fight there for possession of souls – an idea not unknown to Christianity. For others the battle is more within the soul itself, for in order to pass each level it has to divest itself of the energies or tendencies ruled by that planet. At the Moon it leaves behind the power of growth, at Mars the irascible impulses, etc. (see Macrobius, In Somnium Scipionis

i, 12). By the time it attains the heaven of the fixed stars, it is entirely free from all its lower qualities, and escapes from the circles of the cosmos to live with the gods in their realm of perfection. As a Dionysian inscription says, 'I have flown out of the sorrowful, weary wheel; I have pursued with eager feet to the circle desired' (Kaibel, Inscriptiones, no. 641).

It is this realm, and the way there, that are shown in the frescoes of the Villa of the Mysteries at Pompeii (see illustration), where humans mix freely with sub- and superhuman beings. The Orphics called this sphere of the visible universe the Circle of Necessity; Buddhists call it the Wheel of Existence. According to both, the soul can take two alternative routes when it leaves the body: it can either remain within the Wheel, in which case it will sooner or later have to incarnate in another human body; or else it can leave the system altogether and attain perpetual liberation from rebirth. Both believe, moreover, in the eventual liberation of all souls. The Pythagoreans, who were a sect of Orpheus' school, held that at the end of a Great Year all were restored to their primal purity in a Golden Age, as the whole of Creation rejoins its source. The final destiny of all humanity – indeed of all creatures – is therefore the realization of Divinity. The Mystery initiate differs from the others simply in moving consciously towards that goal.

xvi The Realm of Dionysus.
Wall-painting in the Villa of the Mysteries, Pompeii, late first century B.C.

I The Roman Gods

The established religion of Rome was rather like the traditional Church of England: a solemn but unmystical affair, respectable yet undemanding of personal enthusiasm or spiritual effort. It supported the institutions of the family and the State by stressing rectitude in the performance of sacred and secular duties alike. Every paterfamilias was the Pontifex Maximus of his household, and every daughter a Vestal Virgin at her own hearth. Piety towards the gods was reflected in filial piety, the microcosm of the family corresponding to the macrocosm of Rome and the megacosm of a rather small universe. Such a religion considers the gods unphilosophically, intimately, as beings slightly larger than life who respond to human appeals. It seeks its rewards in this life on earth, considering death to be the end, to all intents and purposes, of the individual's existence. For after death comes Dis, a gloomy underworld in which the shades hover around, neither happy nor particularly sad, the semi-conscious husks of worn-out lives. No need, then, to enshrine the dead after the Egyptian or Etruscan fashion in cheerfully furnished and frescoed tomb-houses: for shades cannot appreciate such things.

A cold and prosaic affair was the old Roman faith, established at the behest of Jupiter himself by the legendary King Numa, for the preservation of the status quo among men and gods. Jupiter, Mars, Janus, Quirinus and Vesta formed the original pantheon, the Dii Indigetes, and a separate cult honoured the sun, Sol Indiges, as another of Rome's protectors. Together they ruled the obvious affairs of everyday life, such as war, weather and the home. For some people, then as now, such a religion – or none – sufficed. But it lacked any conception of the Absolute, had no real Mother Goddess, and held out no hopes for an after-life. In the following chapters we will consider some of the alternative and supplementary religions that sprang up in response to the spiritual needs which this quotidian faith could not satisfy.

Foreign goddesses were the first to arrive: Astarte-Atargatis from Phoenicia during the First Punic War (264–241 BC), Cybele in 204 BC, Isis by the first century BC. The Phoenician and East Mediterranean religions had a strong irrational element, while the Egyptian ones appealed to intellectuals and aesthetes (Alexandria being the cynosure of both), and especially to middle-class women of the sort who nowadays practise yoga – another exotic cult. As devotion to these goddesses flourished, the establishment made efforts to Romanize their worship, purging it of excessively foreign elements (like yoga adapted for church-goers). Periodically these cults were altogether suppressed – Isis' five times at least between 59 and 48 B.C. Yet Virgil, writing his political epic the Aeneid, could put Cybele's image on his hero's shield, so far was she accepted as the Great Mother of the Trojans and hence of Rome; and the bluff and soldierly Vespasian could sleep with his son Titus in the Roman Iseum. (One reads such things blandly in histories without always realizing that they would be comparable, say, to General Eisenhower making a retreat with the devotees of Krishna.)

Perhaps because their native religion was so uninspiring, the Romans were unusually tolerant of other men's faiths. Governments followed religious developments rather than instigating or hindering them, and suppressions and persecutions, when they occurred, were seldom unprovoked. The most severe assault on the Isiacs, for example, was prompted by the scandalous seduction of a respectable woman by a priest in the Roman Iseum. The persecutions of Christians and Jews generally followed their refusal to acknowledge the gods of Rome – a scruple that struck pagans as sheer obstinacy and, worse, a threat to the political cohesion of the Empire. If Alexander Severus could revere in his private chapel the statues of Apollo, Christ, Orpheus, Alexander and Abraham, why could not his subjects (whom, incidentally, he did not coerce) be similarly broad-minded?

But behind the tolerance and the syncretism lay a more profound quest, the search for an Absolute which could subsume all regional and aesthetic differences. There cannot be a Many without a One. On an official level this search eventually led through the deification of the Emperor himself to a solar monotheism. In the late third century A.D. Aurelian revived the old cult of Sol Indiges as 'Deus Sol Invictus': a supreme god who also synthesized Helios, Apollo, Mithras and all the Syrian Baals. The old religion of Janus, Quirinus, etc., already much shaken by the success of the Oriental cults, never survived the promotion of Aurelian's solar hierophants above the traditional priests of Rome, and the last battle of the ancient faiths was fought not by Mars but by the hosts of the Unconquered Sun under Licinus, against the Church Militant under Constantine.

1 The Fall of the Titans

Sarcophagus, second century AD. Vatican Museum.

Before the Olympian Gods were born, the Titans reigned, first-born of Heaven and Earth. Jupiter conquered them after they had devoured his son Dionysus Zagreus, and from their ashes he made mankind. Since the Titans had consumed the flesh of the God, mankind contained a divine spark in his gross, titanic body, which could be realized and released through the Mystery initiations. Appropriately enough, then, these hybrid beings decorate a tomb, their upper parts noble even in defeat, their lower, divided selves a squirming mass of reptiles.

2 Jupiter in the Zodiac

Sculpture from the Villa Albani, second century AD. Vatican Museum.

The Father of Heaven, head of the Roman pantheon and ruler from Olympus of both gods and men, is Jupiter Greatest and Best (Jupiter Optimus Maximus). He is a deity of, and above, the whole cosmos, which is his creation: hence this image of him as a 'universal' god whose power is central to the visible world – the world of the Zodiac supported by Atlas, and of day and night figured as the torchbearing Dioscuri beneath his throne. The planet Jupiter is one of his lower manifestations, while to limited, empirical vision the All-Father manifests as a sky god, ruling the weather and wielding his thunderbolt.

The peoples of the East whose theology depended from a single all-powerful being – whether imagined as a sky god or as a metaphysical principle – saw in Jupiter the Roman equivalent of their Lord, whence his many adaptations to other cults and countries, as Jupiter Haded at Baalbek, Jupiter Dolichenus in Commagene, Jupiter Sabazius in Anatolia. Through this syncretism he took on characteristics far removed from those of the anthropomorphic Zeus of Greek mythology, becoming steadily closer to the solemn and inscrutable Jewish or Christian father god. The corresponding decline in his intimacy with man was made good by the mediation of various saviours who bridged the gap between mankind and the Most High, Jupiter Exsuperantissimus.

Although Jupiter had no Mysteries dedicated to him, he is in a way the raison d'être of all the Mysteries, and the Father, in some sense, of most of their founders.

3 Diana-Luna

Mosaic from the Tepidarium of the Oceanus Baths, Sabratha, first century AD. Libya, Sabratha Museum.

'Queen and huntress, chaste and fair . . .'
Ben Jonson thus epitomized the paradoxical nature of Luna: ruler over fertility, she is herself sterile: seductive in her beauty, she is nevertheless a killer, as Actaeon found when he came too close. Her waxing and waning alternately encourage growing things and blight them, as old farmers know. The Moon sphere is also the first stage of the journey to higher worlds: souls go there after leaving earth, and fall from thence into new earth-lives. This is another manifestation of Luna's dual nature, presiding over birth and death in the sublunary realm.

4 Venus with Nymphs

Relief from Coventina's Well, High Rochester, Northumberland, second or third century AD. Newcastle-on-Tyne, Museum of Antiquities.

When Venus travelled with the legions to the North of England, she found herself already worshipped there in a triple form as Brigit, an aspect of the Great Mother Goddess. Like Luna, she is the bringer of fertility to plants, beasts and men, and since without water there can be no corporeal life as we know it, she appropriately rises, like the vegetative principle itself, from the waves. Her attendants – or her other forms – bear basket and pitcher, symbols of plenty, and perhaps allude to Venus' appearance in the sky as both the Morning and the Evening Star.

5 Aesculapius, Apollo and Centaur
Wall-painting from the House of Adonis, Pompeii, first century A.D. Naples, National Museum.

The Greek god of healing, Asklepios (Latinized to Aesculapius), was a son or avatar of Apollo who was raised and educated by the wise centaur Chiron. If the myth of the centaurs derives from the wild Thessalian tribes, whose horsemanship made them seem inseparable from their mounts, then Asklepios may well have been an actual 'hero' who learnt his lore from some shamanistic tribesman. But this is a euhemeristic interpretation, and discounts the reality, known by all true healers, of a healing force of Nature which can be invoked and channelled – the vis medicatrix Naturae. Asklepios then represents the Spirits of Healing who work constantly to balance our sickly condition.

The principal sanctuary of Asklepios was at Epidaurus, with important centres also at Athens, Pergamum and Cos, at which both physical and psychic healing took, and still takes place. One of the favoured cures was incubation: sleeping overnight in the sacred precinct, the sufferer benefited in sleep from the healing forces, and was often rewarded by a dream-message from the god. This would be the equivalent of the 'big dreams' that come to shamans, and also to modern people, around which understanding and future development crystallize. Aelius Aristides, writing in the second century A.D., has left a full account of his own 'analysis' through devotion to the Asklepios of Pergamum.

6 Aesculapius on Tiber Island
Medal of Antoninus Pius, second century
AD. London, British Museum.

In 293 BC a pestilence attacked Rome. Consultation of the Sibylline Books brought the advice that Asklepios be brought from Epidaurus. A brief embassy was sent forthwith: it is not known what it did, or brought back, but the plague seems to have ceased. Two years later the Romans fetched the god more formally, incarnated in a serpent. On approaching Tiber Island, the creature slipped from the ship and swam to shore, and the Romans, always sensitive to omens, built their Temple of Aesculapius on that island. To this day there is a hospital and a church there, dedicated to his Christian reincarnation, St Bartholomew.

Under the influence of subsequent spiritual currents in the Empire, Aesculapius was regarded as a mediator of a more general kind between man and a distant, impersonal god, filling the role of a saviour who heals not only sickness but the soul. He appears on yet another level in the Hermetic writings as one of the sons instructed by Hermes. But whether as god, saviour or disciple, he is a compassionate figure, offering to his devotees the wisdom, medical or occult, which removes the obstacles to their progress. His attribute, the serpent-entwined staff, correspondingly symbolizes both the subtle currents of the body and the spiral windings of the soul's evolutionary path.

7 Oceanus
Mosaic from Hadrumentum, A.D. 150–200.
Tunisia, Sousse Museum.

A gigantic head, decked with seaweed and crowned with crabs' pincers and corals, arises dripping from the main. All around are fish and crustaceans, showing the riches of a realm which the Romanized Africans of Susa could still, like Homer, call 'unharvested'. Oceanus is a member of the primeval trinity, the son of Heaven (Uranus) and Earth (Gaea). He stands for the actual ocean with which ancient geography encircled the earth, for the magnetic field which some ancient Sages knew to surround the earth, and for the oceanic possibilities of a world yet unformed and void, like the Waters of Genesis. In man he arouses the feelings of stupendous depth and breadth associated with the open sea: an experience of impersonal vastness so tangible as to be frightening.

8 Zodiac, Tellus, Seasons

Mosaic from Sentinum, third century AD.
Munich, Glyptothek.

The late Hellenistic and Imperial periods saw the rise to favour of several classes of intermediate divinities: the Muses, Sirens, Hours, Graces and Seasons. The latter, stationed at the four corners of the earth and of the year, impose a fixed scheme upon the circular matrix of planetary revolution. They symbolize the perfection of the quaternary, as manifested in the cycles of time (cf. the Hindus' four Yugas) and the directions of space.

Tellus (Earth) surrounded by the Seasons was used in the early Empire as an allegory of the peace, plenty and harmonious order that a Pax Augusta had brought to the world. The male figure without attributes may be Chronus (Time), turning the circle of the Zodiac. But in the context – for this mosaic comes from a Mithraic temple – he may rather be the Sun, husband of the Earth, whose fertilizing power as he journeys through the Zodiac and the Seasons, makes her fruitful. The feeling is one of Earth and Heaven forming a single happy family.

9 The Seasons

Sarcophagus, c. AD 300–20. Washington, D.C., Dumbarton Oaks Collection.

The Mystery religions recognized that a better fate awaits the dead than an eternity of zombie-like wandering in Dis. The journey through the spheres to a world metaphorically situated above the fixed stars was the goal of human life (see Introduction), and this is the hope expressed by the imagery on many sarcophagi of the later Empire. Like the Jupiter of Pl. 2 and many other figures (Pls 8, 30, 63, 75, 139, 142) the portraits of the deceased, man and wife, are framed by a Zodiac, meaning that they are elevated after death to a cosmic status. Very likely they were devotees of Dionysus, for the vintage scene beneath them shows frolicking putti pressing the intoxicating 'spirits' from the body of the grape: a clear symbol of the extraction of the soul from the body.

The Seasons who stand like heraldic supporters are reminders of the cosmic law and perfect harmony that reign in the beyond. Winged boys are also symbols of love, and death. Winter, dressed in Phrygian costume, is none other than Ganymede, the Phrygian shepherd-boy beloved and abducted by Zeus to become the wine-pourer of Olympus and the winter constellation of Aquarius. If the other Seasons had not lost their arms and attributes we might have been able to differentiate them, too. Both Hypnos and Eros were depicted as winged youths, summoners to the beyond whether through the sleep of death or the aspirations of the lover. Such figures are at the same time – most obviously in the case of Ganymede – symbols of the soul itself, imaged in the purity of youth, which is seized by the rapture of divine love, or flies heavenwards on its own wings.

10 Pan and Hermaphrodite

Wall-painting from Pompeii, first century
A.D. Naples, National Museum.

The horror of Pan on discovering that this beautiful woman is in fact a hermaphrodite is 'the rage of Caliban not seeing his own face in the mirror'. In Platonic terms, the pure, integrated oneness of the Soul is an apparition too fair for the bestial ego to behold. Both characters belong to the twilight world of satyrs, fauns, centaurs and silenī, who according to venerable tradition once thronged the globe, and whose descendants may still be glimpsed by the sensitive. These earlier stages of human evolution, the androgynous and semi-animal states, are recapitulated in the womb. So for an initiate of the Mysteries who had learnt of the true prehistory of mankind, this scurrilous scene would have held serious meanings.

11 Deities of Delos

The Corbridge Lanx, silver, fourth century
A.D. London, British Museum (on loan).

This family group includes the titaness Leto, her children Apollo and Artemis, and her sister Asteria who was transformed into the island of Ortygia, i.e. Delos, birthplace of the god and goddess. Athena joins them by virtue of the Athenians' long interest in the island. The motive for decorating this magnificent ritual tray with Delian divinities was probably the Emperor Julian's sacrifice to Apollo on the island in A.D. 363, before he left for his last campaign against the Persians. Its grandeur of conception and weakness of design seem to reflect the general loss of faith in the old gods, and Julian's almost desperate efforts to revive their former splendour. One remembers his visit to another temple of his favourite god, at Daphne near Antioch, where he hoped to witness spectacular public celebrations at the annual festival. He found instead a single priest, preparing to offer a sacrifice of one goose.

II Mythology

Most people today are persuaded that in the distant past infant mankind gradually differentiated themselves from their animal ancestors, growing step by step in understanding and intelligence until homo became sapiens and was able to take a rational view of the world around him. Things that were not at first understood, like the stars and the seasons, psychological events, birth and death, were expressed in personifications of great beauty and archetypal power. Myths are these explanatory tales told by primitive men when their world was still young, their minds as yet unburdened by logical necessity, their concepts unfocused by the separation of subject and object, mind and matter, reason and fantasy. Even now, the spell of myths holds sway over our atavistic imaginations: they inspire artists, fill our dreams, and even govern our behaviour – for we are not so very different from our forebears.

Another view holds that prehistoric men were not all primitive. Granted, they had perceptions and beliefs that run counter to our own, but if any be incorrect it is not theirs but ours, with our false distinctions and our absurd reliance on logic without feeling. They told in myths not what they fumblingly surmised, but what they knew. Sometimes their knowledge was such as to be inexpressible in our abstracted tongue, and then we must rely on artists, or on intuition, to recreate it for us. The characters in the myths, moreover, are not mere personifications: many of them were real people, others daemons or gods who, in some instances, are still with us. But such is the law of correspondences, layer upon layer, in the universe, that what happens in the realm of the gods is reflected in the life of man and throughout nature. So the same drama is played out at every level, and the myth, wise beyond human telling, may be read as deeply or broadly as one cares to range.

Perhaps for that reason, the mythographers' purpose has been served best by those who have not interpreted the myths, but simply retold them, like most of the visual artists whose work is reproduced here. It is the storytellers who keep the myths alive, who teach them from generation to generation, so that they take root in the soul of Everyman. People in traditional societies are all raised with mythological beliefs, and when these have not been tampered with they are the perfect structures for experience, revealing primordial truths to every epoch and race. They do their work beneath the surface of consciousness, instructing the soul on its origins, nature and destiny. Subtly they inform the mind, preparing it for the day when it no longer need be taught in parables.

The most important myths from the point of view of the Mystery religions are those that concern the descent and ascent of the soul itself. The inclination of the Neopythagoreans and Neoplatonists was to interpret most myths as such, in their fundamental meaning. Homer's Odyssey, for example, received such treatment from Porphyry, the whole tale being understood as the journey of a man's soul to its true home. Such an attempt to adapt mythology to the purposes of spiritual philosophy is looked down upon by modern philosophers and dismissed as a Neoplatonic 'phase', just as the philosophy of Plotinus and Proclus is regarded as a passing episode in man's search for truth. But here we come to the crux of the two attitudes to ancient history mentioned above: the view one holds of mythology will depend on one's estimation of the Sages of the past and of the primeval ancestors who composed the myths in the dawn of history. Are we wiser than them, or were they wiser than us? Are the myths the end-point of their understanding, or a legacy from which to begin our own?

12 Io received by Isis at Canopus

Wall-painting from the House of the Duke of Aumale, Pompeii, first century A.D.
Naples, National Museum.

A Greek legend, illustrated by a Roman artist with Egyptian motifs: here the three streams of ancient mythology meet. Io, a priestess of Argive Hera, was beloved by Zeus. The jealous Hera turned her into a heifer, and placed her under the vigilance of the hundred-eyed herdsman Argos. Hermes was sent by Zeus to slay her gaoler, and Io wandered far and wide until in Egypt she was restored by her lover to human form.

As a cow-shaped figure from Egypt, she was naturally identified with Hathor, the cow aspect of Isis. Here she wears vestigial horns as she is carried by the god of the Nile into the presence of Isis and Harpocrates, attended by hierophants. The story may have inspired Apuleius' Metamorphoses (or The Golden Ass), at the end of which the hero's devotion to Isis rescues him from his donkey form. In both tales the inner meaning is the same: the normal human condition is thought of as 'bestial' in comparison to the state from which we come, and to which we hope to return.

13 Persephone carried off by Pluto
Wall-painting from the Tomb of the Nasonii, Via Flaminia, later third century
A.D. London, British Museum.

Sir James Frazer rightly saw in the central myth of the Eleusinian Mysteries an allegory of the vegetation cycle, in which Persephone is the power of fertility which disappears underground in winter and returns with the spring; but like all exoteric commentators he was blind to the other meanings, without which the ancients would scarcely have taken the Mysteries as seriously as they indubitably did. The stolen goddess represents the soul, alternately descending at birth for 'half a year' in the 'underworld' of bodily existence, and returning at death to the familiar and fruitful fields of her true home.

14 Adonis
Wall-painting in the House of Adonis,
Pompeii, c. first century A.D.

As the local god of Byblos, Adonis was the son-lover of the Great Goddess Astarte. His death came from a wound inflicted by a boar (the animal of winter), but like Persephone he was permitted to return to earth for half of each year, to be with his beloved. Thus Adonis is a male vegetation principle, while Persephone is a female one. One's choice would depend on whether one considered as primary the reproductive powers of Nature, who reawakens every spring, or the fecundating powers of the Sun, who spends most of each winter day visiting the Antipodes. Adonis' cult spread from the Lebanon to Alexandria, Athens and Rome, and was particularly popular among women who, identifying with the Goddess, would annually 'weep for Adonis', then joyfully celebrate his resurrection.

< 15 Narcissus

Cast of a lost well-head from Ostia.
Copenhagen, Thorvaldsens Museum.

The metamorphosis of Narcissus at the pool is another myth of the descent of the soul, in which he is envisaged as falling right down to the vegetative level, becoming a flower. The soul looks down from heaven and sees its own image mirrored in the deceptive surface of matter. Entranced by the sight, it rushes to embrace the image and finds itself tumbling headlong into a watery grave. When it comes to, it is rooted in the cold earth, beautiful but unconscious.

16 Cupid and Psyche

Relief from the Capua Mithracum, third century AD.

Psyche (Soul) was a maiden so beautiful that mortals began to worship her instead of Venus. The jealous goddess sent her son Cupid to inflame Psyche with love for some lowly object: instead, he fell in love with her himself, visiting her incognito by night but forbidding her to behold his true shape. Psyche's jealous sisters persuaded her that her secret lover was a monster, so that she disobeyed his command and, lighting a lamp, looked on him sleeping. A drop of hot wax fell on him: he woke and fled from Psyche, abandoning her to his mother's wrath. For an age she wandered bereft, performing tasks and undergoing torments by Venus, until at last Cupid returned to save her and, in the end, to make her his wife. The tale as told by Apuleius is one of the most beautiful allegories of the descent of the Soul and her redemption by the Divine Lover. The devotee who offered this votive statue must have known the meaning of the myth, and probably identified Cupid with Mithras. Psyche wears butterfly wings, for she has emerged from the chrysalis of her earthly existence to be led by Cupid, the Psychopompos, to the alchemical marriage of Soul with Spirit.

17 Endymion and Selene

Wall-painting from Herculaneum, c. first century AD. Naples, National Museum.

The love of gods and goddesses for mortals has a highly spiritual connotation, as in St John the Divine's description of himself as 'the Disciple whom Jesus loved'. The classical freedom from embarrassment enabled such relationships to be described in antiquity through the apt metaphor of sexual passion. So Venus loved Adonis, Zeus loved a long series of fortunate women, and Selene loved Endymion, to whom Zeus granted unfading beauty – and perpetual sleep. The Moon Goddess is a dangerous lover, for she can entrap one and prevent the development of consciousness – whether one regards this in the psychological context of a 'devouring mother' complex, or in the occult tradition of the Moon sphere as the first stage of cosmic ascent: a boundary that certain souls cannot easily breach, hence remaining stuck in the relative unconsciousness of the Earth sphere.

18 Ulysses and the Sirens

Mosaic from the House of Dionysus, Dugga, third century AD. Tunis, Bardo National Museum.

Homer's Odyssey, like the book of Genesis, has more meanings than appear on the surface. The tale of Ulysses' wanderings is an allegory of the progress of the soul through earthly life, passing through many hazards, lessons and temptations until at the end it rejoins its faithful spouse in the haven of Ithaca, a city symbolic of the soul's true home. The Sirens' song, according to Thomas Taylor, 'signifies alluring and fraudulent pleasures which charm the soul' (note on Porphyry, De Antro Nympharum). The sailors correspond to those who must simply block their ears with wax, i.e. avoid such temptations altogether. It is for them that moral commandments and prohibitions are made. Ulysses, as a stronger character, takes the risk of seduction but is 'restrained by the bands of philosophy', so that he can 'experience delight without resigning the empire of reason to its fascinating control'.

III The Imperial Cult

Rulers have always been considered closer to the immortals than ordinary men. They have special relationships with the gods, and themselves aspire to the ranks of demigods and heroes. Alexander the Great declared himself the son of Zeus-Ammon after his encounter with the god in the Syrian desert. Scipio Africanus felt himself directly inspired by Jupiter after visiting his temple on the Capitoline Hill. Perhaps in emulation of these great leaders, perhaps also because of the tide of the times, the Roman emperors tended periodically to accept, or to claim, divine honours. This meant that they had temples, sacrifices and prayers dedicated to them; and it meant, presumably, that worship of them when alive or dead would procure the same objects as worship of any of the immortals.

In part this was a return to the idea of the Sacred Kings who ruled in the ancient days of Rome, though after the Republic no one dared to use the hated title of Rex. The old belief that the health of a nation is tied to that of its king led in primitive cultures to the periodic replacement of the old king by a younger and more virile challenger. But the attitude from Alexander onwards is more metaphysical, for both he and the Romans were influenced by the Oriental concept of the sovereign as avatar. According to this, the king has a 'genius' or presiding spirit, as every man does – perhaps it corresponds most closely to what some call the guardian angel – but the king's genius is of a higher order, belonging not to the humble ranks of daemons and sprites but to the company of the gods themselves. 'To those from whom much is expected, much is given.' The same was claimed for the philosophers Socrates and Plotinus. The king may even be a god himself, descended to earth in a temporary physical body for the benefit of mortals. As much is claimed for Jesus. It is therefore not the emperor as man, nor his personality or ego, which is worshipped, but his guiding spirit.

The situation is closely paralleled in Tibet, whose Dalai Lamas are regarded as tulkus (incarnations) of Avalokiteshvara, Bodhisattva of Compassion. The Dalai Lama, besides being the spiritual head of the largest Gelupka sect, was until recently also the temporal ruler of the nation. Just so, the Roman emperor from Julius Caesar onwards was also Pontifex Maximus of the State religion, high priest or 'bridge-builder' between men and gods.

If an emperor, or anyone else, is thought of as having incarnated something divine, then it follows that after his death that divine influence lives on and continues to deserve reverence. The deification of emperors after their death is quite similar in this regard to the Roman Catholic procedure of canonization; only the word 'god' sticks in the throats of monotheists. The simple Italians of the early centuries AD doubtless thought of the deified emperors as benign figures inhabiting the Empyrean, ready to listen to the requests of mortals if suitably prompted by sacrifice, just as their modern descendants imagine the saints in heaven who respond to candles, prayers and oblations.

The first emperor to be deified, two years after his death, was Julius Caesar (who did not himself believe in personal immortality). If he had been succeeded by Mark Antony, the divinization of the emperor would have continued there and then, for Antony had entered Ephesus as 'Dionysus' to be received by ecstatic maenads, and at his triumph in 34 BC had outraged Roman custom by offering his spoils not to Capitoline Jupiter but to Cleopatra clad as Isis, casting himself in the saviour role of Dionysus or Osiris. But this divine couple attained immortality only in literature, for the victor of Actium, Octavian (Pl. 19) had little feeling for foreign cults. He preferred Apollo, and encouraged the old Roman worship of Sol Indiges – as he encouraged everything old and Roman – by refounding the Secular Games in which the four-horse chariots raced like the Sun around the great obelisk of Seti I in the Circus Maximus.

After Augustus, most of the early emperors were led as much by public opinion as by their own tastes to support the Egyptian cults and accept a quasi-pharaonic role. Caligula of course revelled in the more bizarre aspects such as holy incest, dressing up statues, and ostentatious mourning. Claudius thought the cult of the Great Mother Cybele preferable to the Egyptian cults, but failed to make it the universal religion of the Empire. The solid Vespasian became a devotee of Serapis after a miraculous cure and vision in Alexandria. Domitian, after the priests of Isis had saved his life, built huge temples for the goddess, dressed as Osiris and adopted Egyptian dietary laws. It was he who first received the address of 'lord and god' (dominus et deus) while still alive. Trajan was too much of a soldier to have much interest in the rather theatrical rites of the Egyptian cults, but even he is shown on his triumphal arch sacrificing to Isis and Harpocrates. Such general acceptance of Egyptian ideas, together with the practice of posthumous deification, persisted through the reigns of the second-century 'good emperors' Hadrian (Pl. 22), Antoninus Pius (Pl. 23) and Marcus Aurelius (Pl. 41).

Marcus' stoic pessimism prevented him from indulging in such ideas himself, but it had little effect on his subjects as a whole. Commodus showed the lengths to which divine aspirations could push a man in his position. A religious dilettante, he observed Egyptian ceremonies, had a taurobolium, took part in the initiations of Mithras where he accidentally killed a man, and believed himself to be Hercules. He was murdered when on the point of demonstrating his herculean gifts by fighting in the Circus as a gladiator. After Septimius Severus (Pl. 24) and Caracalla (Pl. 25), the fourteen-year-old Syrian priest Elagabalus used the Imperium to push the cult of his own version of the Sun God at the expense of all others. His aspiration for one faith, one god, and one priest-king was a worthy one, but quite unworkable in practice, in the terrible third century, and dubious in theory so long as the priest-king was someone so unstable.

After fifty years of political turmoil Aurelian (Pl. 26) revived Elagabalus' solar monotheism as a means of unifying the Empire under himself as avatar of the Unconquered Sun God. Diocletian followed suit, an avatar this time of Jupiter, while his co-ruler Maximian was 'Hercules'. Constantine was another sun-emperor, who replaced the head of the colossal Helios in the Forum with his own, and flattered himself on his divine gift for searching the hearts of men. When after AD 323 it became politically expedient to enrol the Christians on his side, he had no trouble in changing his allegiance to the creator of the visible sun, nor in persuading the bishops to accept him as a chosen 'Man of God', the receiver of frequent personal visitations from above. Eusebius compared Constantine on his throne to God enthroned on the vault of heaven, and such similes persisted for centuries in the Eastern Empire, giving the theme to the entire Byzantine court ritual.

Constantine was the last of the god-emperors. Julian, who revived the solar worship for a brief Indian summer, was too Hellenic to take himself with the requisite seriousness, and after the Christianization of the Empire, both Eastern and Western rulers had to make at least a token obeisance to the new divinity of Christ. Examples from later history, however, show the same impulse working periodically in the inflated imaginations of rulers: the Emperor Maximilian planning to retire to the Papacy and die as a saint; Napoleon seizing the imperial crown from the Pope's hands and putting it on his own head; Hitler devising creeds and rituals for his master race.

19 Octavian as Thoth-Hermes

Stucco relief from the Farnesina, 30–25 B.C.
Rome, National Museum.

Among the decorations of the Roman villa excavated near the Farnesina is a group of gods who include this portrait of Octavian, later the Emperor Augustus, in the guise of Thoth, Graeco-Egyptian god of wisdom. Thoth, identified with the Greek Hermes and Roman Mercury, was fabled to have brought the Egyptians their letters, learning, medicine, and all the accoutrements of higher civilization. In the Augustan age it seemed for a time that the Emperor was restoring these gifts to a Rome wracked by civil war.

Augustus himself was an initiate of the Eleusinian Mysteries and a devotee of Apollo, even regarded by some as an incarnation of the Sun God. It was under his rule that Apollo was first admitted within the exclusive precinct of the Pomerium, with a splendid temple built in 28 B.C. on the Palatine Hill. At the same time Augustus expelled from the inner city those Oriental cults which had no traditional place in the old Roman religion, believing that the new Age of Gold for which his subjects yearned could only be founded on the solid heritage of the past.

20 An Early Emperor as Triptolemus
Silver patera from Aquileia, first century
AD. Vienna, Kunsthistorisches Museum.

Another emblem of the ruler as bringer of gifts to his people is this identification of an early emperor with Triptolemus, the mortal to whom Demeter first revealed the secrets of agriculture and fertility. Resembling in design the Tazza Farnese (Pl. 95), this plaque shows Jupiter in the sky watching the Emperor sacrificing to the seated figure of Demeter. Placed diagonally, the four Seasons attend him; three children assist in the sacrifice, and at the bottom Tellus and a cow recline comfortably. As to the identification of the emperor, Caligula, Claudius and Nero have all been suggested. Although none of them were initiated into Demeter's Mysteries at Eleusis, the græcophile Nero would have most welcomed the identification with Triptolemus.

21 Nero as High Priest of Apollo
Roman coin, c. AD 60. London, British Museum.

Nero's love of art and Greek culture would have made for a happier reign had he not been encouraged by terrified sycophants into excesses of egotism. His morally unscrupulous and sentimental nature made him unequal to the demands of the Imperium. Yet, although the Persian flatterer Tiridates addressed him as 'Mithra', 'Tyche', 'Moirai', he never claimed to be a god, only a universal genius. His cosmic throne-room, which, if reports are true, had a revolving ceiling that moved with the heavens, was the centre of the Roman universe; and if not a devotee of Apollo in the religious sense, Nero's natural deity was the leader of the Muses, patron of the arts, and director of the cosmic dance.

22 Hadrian and Serapis
Roman coin, c. AD 120–30. London, British Museum.

Everything Egyptian appealed to Hadrian, most romantic of the emperors. He loved the mysterious side of the Egyptian religion, the temples and gardens, the gods and the deified pharaohs. The god Serapis, lord of Alexandria, stood for that blend of Greek and Egyptian culture which Hadrian admired, and on this coin he concurs with the Emperor in dedicating an altar to the Imperial cult. It was a time when peace reigned, and even the Christian Patriarch would worship Serapis as well as Christ when he visited Alexandria. Hadrian had an Egyptian water-garden and Serapeum built at Tivoli, and statues of Isis in Hellenized style decorated his new villa there. After his lover Antinous was drowned in the Nile, the beloved's body was celebrated in numerous sculptures and his soul elevated to godhead by Imperial decree: an honour bestowed upon Hadrian himself after his death.

23 Apotheosis of Antoninus Pius and Faustina
From Antoninus Pius' column, AD 160–1.
Vatican, Cortile della Pigna.

Antoninus earned his surname by his piety in deifying his adopted father Hadrian, and fully deserved it for the twenty-three years of peace he brought to Rome. Upon his death he was immediately deified, and this column erected. The magnificent winged figure combines the attributes of Aion (Eternal Time) with those of the beautiful Eros-Hypnos-Thanatos, the winged boy who leads souls to the 'beyond', in any sense. Eagles hover as attendant spirits, indicating that the family of gods to which the Emperor now belongs is that of Jupiter. Rome and Egypt bid farewell.

24 Septimius Severus and Julia Domna sacrificing

Rome, Arch of the Argentarii, AD 203-4.

Septimius Severus was born in Libya, married a Syrian priestess, visited Egypt and died in York. His inner world seems to have been as vivid as his outer. He understood astrology and had his own horoscope painted on the ceiling of his courtroom (compare Nero's revolving dome). Once he dreamed that four eagles were bearing him heavenwards, and even in his lifetime he accepted assimilation to Serapis, returning from Egypt with his hair trained in Serapean forelocks. His empress Julia Domna came from the family of the high priest of Elagabal in Emesa, and accompanies him here with a gesture of prayer as he officiates as Pontifex Maximus. The Emperor and Empress have a triple function as rulers, hierophants and deities: in the latter function, they are Jupiter-Serapis and Juno Caelestis, descended to guide and enlighten their mortal subjects. Perhaps a figure of Hermes was originally planned to stand on the Empress's left, but only his caduceus carved. If so, he would have been an appropriate partner as the guide of souls and the bringer of good fortune, the twin objects of religious ritual.

25 Caracalla as the Infant Hercules
Statue, c. AD 195. Rome, Capitoline
Museum.

As the oldest son of Septimius Severus, Caracalla carried high hopes from his birth. Here he is shown as the infant hero who strangled in his cradle the two serpents sent to kill him by Hera: perhaps an apotropaic gesture against the fates that sometimes befall young heirs. On his accession, Caracalla followed his father in devotion to Serapis, appearing on his coins as 'Serapis Cosmocrator', calling himself 'Philosarapis' and leading the Egyptian cults to their zenith.

26 Aurelian with Solar Crown
Roman coin, AD 270-5. London, British Museum.

Aurelian was the ultimate Sun King, combining the avataric function of Akhnaton with the pride of Louis Quatorze. He was the first emperor officially to be called 'Deus' while still alive, and his god was the Unconquered Sun. His mother had been a priestess of the Sun God in Pannonia, and when Aurelian came to fight the troops of Zenobia in the Syrian desert the god gave him victory. He never faltered from then on in his devotion, but unlike other monotheists was wise enough to accept all other gods as aspects of the Supreme. He built for the Sun splendid temples, instituted games, established a college of priests parallel to that of the old Roman gods (heading both colleges as Pontifex Maximus), and unified the Empire both politically and religiously.

IV Magical and Folk Beliefs

The exoticism of the Oriental religions and the snob-appeal of the Imperial cult held little attraction for the conservative Italian peasantry. They lived, nevertheless, in a universe thronged with immaterial beings whose anger or favour must be considered at every turn. Superstition is the philosophy of the peasant, and magic his Mystery religion. Neither is to be despised, any more than his age-old wisdom of root and branch, wind and weather, seed-time and harvest. Folk beliefs and folk art often contain doctrines and symbols of an authentic kind, deriving from the primordial revelation to the race, and they often preserve ideas in all their purity long after 'fine' art has abandoned them to chase its own aesthetic chimeras. Fairy tales are one example of this (consider the tale of Sleeping Beauty, for instance, as a myth of the soul's descent and rebirth); geometrical art, with its spirals and swastikas, is another. Unfortunately for us, the materials of peasant art are usually organic and ephemeral (wood, cloth), in contrast to the official media of bronze and stone, so comparatively little of it has lasted from antiquity.

These plates show mainly middle-class artefacts, but ones which are informed by beliefs common to the folk as a whole: beliefs in witches, fairies and hobgoblins, in gnomes of the garden and ghosts of the dead. The strains of black and white magic intertwine, shading off into a kind of grey magic which, while not usually vicious in intent, still serves only the earthly interests of the operator. Some would see evidence here of what they call the Old Religion, of the god of the witches with whom we associate phallicism, sympathetic magic, spells and charms. Others would identify these Lares and Lemures with the Spirits of Place, with subterranean currents, dragon lines and the like. Both are right in their own way, for the folk have always known something of both realms: the sublunary spirits and the energies beneath the earth. The co-operation of both is necessary before the humblest weed can sprout, and without them both peasants and patricians would have long ceased to eat.

27 Offering to Priapus
Altar from Aquileia, first century A.D.
Aquileia, Museo Nazionale.

Priapus is a god of fertility, and his attributes are fruits and his phallus. He is a simple deity, and loved by simple people whose life and livelihood depends on the fertility of plant and beast. To him it is appropriate to offer one's first fruits, in expectation of obtaining an abundance in return. The old devotee here seems to be receiving the sacrificial fire from the source of life itself.

28 Priapus

Terracotta lamp from Pompeii, c. first century A.D. Naples, National Museum.

Priapus' excessive virility has another, aggressive side to it, which in our unmagical times surfaces only in slang expressions. This homunculus is designed to be hung up in a doorway, his phallus aflame, telling evil spirits and other undesirables in no uncertain terms to 'f—— off'!

29 Ivy-wreathed Herm

Bronze herm, allegedly from Konya, first century A.D. University of Pennsylvania Museum.

The herm or terminal god originated as a mere pillar, marking boundaries and other important spots. With the tendency of such stones to become personified, it was natural for the head to be added, and the phallus completes the anatomy with the idea of drawing cosmic forces creatively into the earth – another function of sacred stones. Garlanding and wreathing the stones with evergreens encourages their double guardian and fecundating function. So all the features are reproduced in miniature on this bronze, doubtless designed for some house shrine.

30 Lar

Bronze statuette from Herculaneum, c. first century A.D. Naples, National Museum.

This Lar carries a sheaf of wheat and a wine bucket, symbols of the two basic foodstuffs for bodily and mental well-being. He looks like a young slave, perhaps incorporating the idea of the beneficent elf or friendly gnome common in fairy tales who helps in the household and secretly aids the heroine.

31 Altar of the Lares

Wall-painting from Pompeii, first century
A.D. Naples, National Museum.

Pious Romans must have lived in a universe populated by unseen divinities of house and hearth, some friendly in aspect like these two Lares, others awe-inspiring like the gigantic serpents in the lower register. The sacrifice of a pig is about to take place, to the raw sound of double pipe (aulos) and foot-clapper. The Lares dispense their life-giving liquor with more panache than good aim, and the chthonian spirits, kept in their place underground, approach to feast on the victim's life force, symbolized by the testicles.

32 Sacrificial Ram on Altar

Statue of unknown provenance. London, British Museum.

The careful carving of a dead ram shows the respect in which the practice of sacrifice was held in antiquity. Apart from the symbolic offering of the animal's life force on behalf of the sacrificer, the ritual slaying afforded an opportunity for divination. Haruspicy (divination from examining the entrails of the victim) was a valued source of revelation: from the condition of the entrails could be judged the success or otherwise of whatever venture had prompted the sacrifice. Roman history is full of events predicted in this way, some of them no doubt self-fulfilled prophecies, but others genuine instances of magical precognition.

33 Charm of Solomon

Bronze medal, fifth century AD or later. University of Michigan.

'Whosoever dwelleth under the defence of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty' (Psalm 91). 'To God be victory over evil.' 'Holy, holy, holy Lord of Sabaoth.' 'The seal of the Living God is mixed with this amulet to protect against all evil.'

With such quotations, we clearly have an object designed to ward off supernatural influences, personified in the lion-woman whom 'Solomon' (as he is styled in similar designs) is spearing. On the obverse is Christ in Majesty between the four beasts, a lion and a crab, and symbols which resemble closely the sigils of the planets in later grimoires. The whole is a synthesis of Christian, Jewish and astrological magic, and the design anticipates the later iconography of St George and the Dragon, and Perseus and Andromeda.

34 Triple Hecate

Stele from Constantinople, second-third century AD. London, British Museum.

Hecate is the Great Goddess in her darker and more sinister aspects: the goddess of graveyards, crossroads and nocturnal conjurations. According to Plutarch, the Moon is the domain of both a chthonic and a uranian Hecate, meaning that the particular power which she represents exists in earth, moon and sky, the domains of the three Fates. Alternatively she can be seen as a goddess of the Moon alone, in the three phases originally ascribed to her: waxing, full and waning. In either case she reigns over maleficent forces, and it is as well to be on good terms with her.

35 The Sacred Betyl entering Rome

Gold aureus of Elagabalus, c. AD 225. London, British Museum.

The power of many of the East Mediterranean gods was incarnated in sacred stones: sometimes meteorites, sometimes hewn or unhewn rocks. The archaic obelisks of Byblos still stand as monuments to the spirits of that place, captured like Ariel in Prospero's cloven pine. But the meteoric stone or 'betyl' of Emesa was a movable home for what its high priest, Elagabalus, considered the Supreme Deity; so when he became emperor he had it moved to Rome. It entered the city mounted like all triumphant gods on a four-horse chariot (see also Pls 50, 83, 103, 121, 139), and no one could deny that it brought the most extraordinary influences with it, leading Rome to anarchy and chaos. Alexander Severus, who succeeded Elagabalus' short and disastrous rule, probably did wisely to send back the betyl to Emesa and rid the city of its sinister power.

V Philosophers

The culture of the classical age of Greece owed its peculiar quality and greatness to the precarious, knife-edge balance which its artists and thinkers were able to maintain between the material and spiritual worlds, each informing the other, neither side avoided or overemphasized. When the Hellenic epoch drew to a close in the first century B.C., the equilibrium was broken, and even the best efforts to revive it were thereafter no more than artificial respiration. The philhellenic emperors Hadrian and Julian only succeeded, like the Gothic Revivalists, in an earnest but lifeless pastiche of the original. The lightness and life had gone from the Greek forms, because the spirit had departed, leaving aspiration without insight, technique without sprezzatura.

In philosophy the reaction was for the two sides of the balance to part company. On the one hand there flourished superstition, an unintelligent star-lore and a simplistic magic; on the other, a rank scepticism. The lower manifestations of the Mystery religions abetted this imbalance, repelling the philosophical as they attracted the sensation-seekers. The consensus of belief was shattered, and nowhere so strikingly as in the variety of opinions which were now held, not just by contentious philosophers but by ordinary people, on the subject of the Soul.

Stoics and Epicureans had a neat and easy way of disposing of this problematic entity. They restricted their idea of a soul to the etheric body, the carrier of vital energy which man shares with the animal and even the vegetable kingdom. They held that this does not long survive bodily death, but decomposes along with the physical body and returns to its own 'dust', the ether, without rising above the sphere of the Moon. The Stoics accepted the existence of higher elements in man, such as the Fire of Reason, but believed that this also dissolves back into its universal source, leaving no individuality to experience any posthumous state. Stoic immortality – if one can call it that – occurs only as the eternal, cyclic return of all events in the Universe: some day, aeons hence, one will come again and lead the same life on the same earth. Stoicism is thus rather like a Buddhism without a Nirvana. Epicurean immortality is simpler still, lasting only so long as one is remembered upon earth. Epicurus himself rather pathetically enjoined his disciples to celebrate his monthly birthday after he was gone.

Aristotle also denied any happiness to the dead, allowing the Rational Soul (the highest element in man) an impersonal existence only. Yet even this was denied by some Peripatetics of the third and second centuries B.C., such as the Aristotelian commentator Alexander of Aphrodisias, who 'proved' that both the rational and the animal soul die with the body; and if indeed death is the dissolution of personality, then this is certainly a logical conclusion. Given these dismal prospects, the best life one could be encouraged to live was a harmless one, avoiding what suffering and pursuing what pleasure one could.

When we turn to the Mystery religions and to the philosophers who provided their intellectual underpinning, things are very different. For all of them, on the exoteric level, the hope and expectation was that after death the Soul would be reunited with God and live for ever with him or her in boundless felicity. None would deny that the subtle bodies dissolve like corpses when they are vacated: but these are not confused with the Soul, or higher Self, which persists through death to live a new life. The famous tomb inscription, 'I was not – I became – I am no more – I do not care', probably refers to this doctrine: 'I', the lower ego embodied awhile in matter of various densities, is of no lasting concern.

An important point still remains, however. Does this new life of the Soul mark the end of striving, the end of individual effort, or is there more to come? The simpler philosophy is to draw the line then and there and to think no more about it: to assume that if one follows a prescribed path in life, one will go happily to Heaven. More profound thinkers cannot avoid asking awkward questions: what exactly is Heaven? What is the exact nature of the Soul? How can soul be a separate entity if it is one with the god? What god is it one with? Why was it in a body in the first place? Where did it come from? These are the questions asked, and answered, by the philosophers of the Pythagorean-Platonic tradition. They learned the answers not through reasoning alone but through initiation into the Mysteries. Without initiation or mystical intuition a philosopher is restricted to the narrow field of rational speculation in which he can only pace to and fro, like a caged lion, ignorant of what true freedom can be.

36 Pythagoras (c. 570–470 BC)
Bronze head from the Villa dei Pisoni, Herculaneum. Naples, National Museum.

Born on the isle of Samos, Pythagoras studied with the Greek philosophers Pherekydes, Anaximander and Thales, visited the Magi of Babylon and the hierophants of Egypt, and returned to found a school of spiritual science in Crotona, south Italy. He is seldom credited with his true rôle, which was to transplant some of the esoteric wisdom of those ancient and moribund civilizations into the new soil of Greece, combining it with elements of the Orphic tradition. His philosophy sought above all to purify the soul through revealed knowledge and asceticism: thus his pupils had to undergo a five-year period of unquestioning instruction, and observe strict rules of conduct.

37 Socrates (469–399 BC)
Antique copy of Lysippus' original
(c. 325 BC). Vatican Museum.

Socrates did not learn his philosophy through the normal human channels, but intuitively through intimacy with his daemon or guardian spirit. In the portrait of him which emerges from Plato's dialogues, he shows all the qualities that one associates with the Enlightened ones of Buddhism and Hinduism: courage, compassion, humour and inner peace. Socrates was the first religious teacher in the West to encourage doubt and the questioning of dogma, trusting his pupils to reach their vision of the truth and to conduct their lives on a basis of their own inner convictions. In this he contrasts strongly with the didactic Pythagoras. Not a writer himself, he made use of Plato's great literary powers to immortalize his method of enquiry and his ethical system.

38 Plato (c. 429–347 BC)
Antique copy of Silanion's original
(c. 370 BC). Holkham Hall, Norfolk.

Plato drew his wisdom from the twin sources of Egypt and Socrates. Egyptian science and mysticism he knew directly through initiation there, and indirectly through his friendship with Pythagoreans. Through Socrates' influence, he was able to present his incomparable system of philosophy not as revelation but as a reasoned argument. The dualities within Plato's own work, such as those of spiritual certainty versus logical enquiry, or collective organization versus the individual's quest, epitomize all the problems and tasks of subsequent Western civilization, from the political to the mystical level.

< 40 Arrival of a Soul in Elysium
Stucco relief in the Porta Maggiore Basilica, Rome, c. AD 50.

The heaven of the mystical philosophers differed both from those of the Stoics, Epicureans and Peripatetics (who had none), and from the twilight existence which was all that traditional Roman religion offered the ordinary person after death. Although there was not agreement as to the exact part of the soul that survives death, Pythagoreans, Platonists and every Mystery cult concurred in envisaging death not as an end but as a beginning to life on another plane, perhaps more significant and almost certainly more agreeable than our present one. The reception of a soul in 'Elysium' is a solemn and joyous occasion, at which the soul is personified as Ariadne greeted by Bacchantes as she enters Dionysus' own realm.

< 39 Subterranean Basilica Beneath the Porta Maggiore, Rome.
c. AD 50.

This remarkable underground chapel was discovered in 1917 beneath the railway line; it seemed to have been abandoned almost as soon as it was completed, with its decorations of low stucco reliefs depicting mythological scenes and characters. Its exact purpose is unknown. Carcopino thought it the actual 'church' of a Neopythagorean congregation: Vermaseren interprets it as most probably a funeral chapel or chantry. In the place of honour on the apse is the poetess Sappho, a favourite of the Pythagoreans, who, driven to desperation by her love for the ferryman Phaon, leapt off the Leucadian rock into the sea (told in Ovid, Heroides 15). In this context Sappho represents the soul, living in 'poetic' harmony, who in revulsion against excessive attachment to the physical body takes the leap into the sea of the unknown, either through initiation or at actual death.

41 The Stoic Emperor Marcus Aurelius
(AD 121–80)
Bronze medallion, c. AD 170. London,
British Museum.

'Think on this doctrine: that reasoning beings are created for one another's sake; that to be patient is a branch of justice; and that men sin without intending it.'

'All that is harmony for thee, O Universe, is in harmony with me as well. Nothing that comes at the right time for thee is too early or too late for me.'

'You will find rest from vain fancies if you do every act in life as if it were your last.'

from Marcus Aurelius' Meditations
(iv, 3, 23; ii, 5)

42 Epicurean Skeletons

Silver goblet from the Boscoreale Treasure, first century B.C. Paris, Louvre.

This shadow-play of corpses mocks those who take seriously such doctrines as the immortality of the soul, the existence of heavens or hells, communication with the gods. The disciple of Epicurus is urged to do away with rites and superstition and to 'survey all things with a mind at peace' (Lucretius, De Rerum Natura v, 1194 ff.). 'Suns may rise again, but ours is an eternal sleep' (Catullus v, 4). One should be glad that death will surely come: it is the greatest boon, since there is no Hell to fear and no consciousness beyond the grave. To his disciples Epicurus was the equivalent of a saviour god, having freed them from all fear and given them rules for the conduct of a good life – which are not, as it happens, very different from those of the Stoics, since they stress not gluttony and hedonism but temperance and loyalty. True Epicureanism, like Buddhism, teaches that the fewer desires one has, the less one suffers the pain of unsatisfied longing.

43 The Emperor Julian (AD 332–63)
Statue, AD 361–3. Paris, Louvre.

Julian 'the Apostate' forsook the semblance of Christianity in which he had been brought up, and when he unexpectedly succeeded to the Imperium made it his life's ambition to restore the worship of the Gods. Unlike previous reforming emperors, he was well versed in philosophy and theology of the Neoplatonic school, and himself (like all the Neoplatonists) an initiate and a mystic. He encouraged the revival of the lower forms of paganism, such as sacrifice and theurgy (see Introduction), only because he could understand their metaphysical and theological basis. For his own part, his inclination was towards a solar monotheism that recognized the visible Sun in the sky as the lowest of a series of gods that reached up, ultimately, to the Absolute One. Unfortunately he died young in battle and his reforms were almost immediately dismantled.

44 Apuleius of Madaura (c. AD 123 – after AD 180)
Gold contorniate, second century AD. Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale.

Apuleius moved in fashionable circles as a poet, rhetorician and chief priest of the province of Carthage. He is one of the great worldly disciples of the initiatic tradition, who like Socrates and Julian could range from ribald humour to mystical ecstasy. The novel for which he is justly celebrated, entitled Metamorphoses or The Golden Ass, describes the fate of one Lucius who meddled with magic and was turned into a donkey. Lucius suffered and learned much in this form before he was restored to human shape through his devotion to Isis, receiving a theophany of the goddess and of Osiris that Apuleius recounts in one of the most persuasive descriptions of mystical experience to have survived from the ancient world.

45 Philosophers and Muses
Sarcophagus of Publius Peregrinus, c. AD 250. Rome, Museo Torlonia.

The philosopher is 'saved' not by a mediating divinity but by the elevation of his own soul through wisdom. In this sarcophagus Publius and his wife are assimilated to the Seven Sages and the Nine Muses: they themselves complete the traditional numbers. The Muses, guardians of wisdom, patronesses of the arts and sciences, are the teachers and inspirers of philosophers, and also, in late antiquity, the guides of the soul after death. There is some apt psychological symbolism in the attitudes of husband and wife: she personifies with her closed scroll Sophia, the innate possessor of all wisdom, while he exercises the masculine Logos as he reads from an open scroll. The feminine knows all things, yet looks to the masculine for rational understanding and verbal expression.

VI Judaism

The point at which canonical Judaism comes closest to the Mystery religions is in the Wisdom literature of the early centuries BC: Koheleth (Ecclesiastes), Ben Sira (Ecclesiasticus), Chokmah (Wisdom of Solomon), Proverbs, and the Book of Job. Here the Jewish perspective extends over the whole of humanity, dividing mankind not into Jews and Gentiles but rather into the Wise and the Foolish. The piety of the heart is stressed more than obedience to the Mosaic law, and Jehovah is seen as the Lord over the whole earth who has created and ordered all things visible and invisible.

This reformed Judaism developed primarily in Hellenistic Alexandria, where a large colony of Jews thrived in easy commerce with people of other races. The Septuagint translation of the scriptures into Greek was made in the last centuries BC to serve those Jews whose first language was no longer Hebrew, and in the same climate of Hellenic and Egyptian influence some Jewish philosophers sought to reconcile their ancestral faith with the wisdom of other peoples. Some, following the rational principles of Aristotle and Euhemerus, questioned the fundamentalist attitude to the Pentateuch (the first five books of the Bible) and began to interpret them allegorically. When such allegorizing was applied, for example, to the Mosaic dietary laws, it threatened the whole structure of social customs which differentiate Jews from Gentiles. But despite such rapprochements with the world of the Diaspora, the one thing which the Jews would never abandon was their monotheism: 'Thou shalt have no other gods but me.' For those of the Palestinian revival under the Maccabees, 'me' signified the Jehovah who had given them the victory over their oppressor Antiochus Epiphanes, enabled them to expel from Jerusalem the hated cults of Olympian Zeus and Dionysus, and pressed them on to expand their territories. For the Alexandrian mystical philosopher Philo, 'me' was Ain Soph, the Absolute, devoid, like Plato's One or the Hindu Brahma, of all qualities whatsoever. This monotheism had always inclined the Jews to hold in contempt the gods which their neighbours worshipped, and such an attitude led in AD 38 to serious violence against them by the Greek citizens of Alexandria. Philo, no longer a young man, was chosen by his community as an emissary to Rome, like St Paul twenty years later, to petition the Emperor Gaius for exemption from observance of the Imperial cult.

It would be interesting to know how great a part has been played by language in the history of the monotheistic religions, because both Muslims and Christians have always been willing to accept as 'saints' and 'angels' those powers to which pagans give the names of 'heroes' and 'gods'; and the heaven of Philo's theology is full of angels, who like the Platonic Ideas or the Neoplatonic gods are contained in the mind of the Supreme One. The highest of these, subsuming all the others, Philo calls the Logos: the principle of reason and order through which God makes the universe. The Wisdom literature had already separated this concept as Chokmah, the Divine Wisdom; the Gnostics knew it in Philo's day as Sophia; St John the Evangelist was to identify it with the Christ. And at the same time the Kabbalists were analysing the levels of being in their own way, making Chokmah the second of the ten divine emanations whose scheme they set out as the Tree of the Sephiroth. When Kabbalists analyse the Pentateuch, breaking down the actual words into their numerical equivalents, they find metaphysical and cosmological doctrines concealed in the very letter of the Law. This suggests that whoever wrote those earliest Hebrew scriptures was already adept at understanding, and concealing, the most profound knowledge. 'Moses' – whether he was a single man, a succession of masters, or an esoteric school – learnt his lore from the sages of Egypt, and recast it in this form.

So beneath the surface of Judaism there has always been a strong Mystery content. Philo forbade his people to take part in pagan initiations, suggesting that there were Mysteries in their own faith to which they might aspire. Certainly the road is hard, and reserved for the few who have shown sufficient zeal in studying the Torah, the body of the Mosaic Law, and its formidable commentaries. As a result, most Jews remain to this day ignorant of their esoteric heritage, regarding it as a strange pursuit of the exceedingly Orthodox, unless they have been led by a more general interest in religion to learn what they can of it through books. Yet it cannot be denied that the Kabbalistic schools are the sole representatives of the Mystery religions that have continued uninterruptedly from the day of their foundation until the present.

46 Menorah with the Seasons

Fragment of sarcophagus from the Vigna Rondanini catacomb, Rome, c. AD 300.
Rome, National Museum.

The Mosaic commandment against graven images was not strictly observed in later Judaism, as illustrated by this Hellenized Jewish sarcophagus which with its Dionysian vintage-scene and naked Winter borrows from such pagan iconography as that of Pls 9 and 100. The Seven-branched Candlestick is a symbol of the Sun surrounded by the six planets, and hence of the journey the soul makes after death in all the Mystery religions. Esoterically, the Menorah also conceals the Kabbalistic Tree of the ten Sephiroth, the system of divine emanations that is the highest philosophical achievement of Judaism.

The enclosure of a god's image in the circle of the Zodiac, found very frequently in late antiquity (e.g. Pls 2, 8, 75), finds here its Jewish equivalent in the circle held by two Victories, on which is the impersonal image of the Menorah.

47 Anointing of King David

Wall-painting (copy) from the Synagogue, Dura Europos, c. AD 240. Original in the National Museum, Damascus.

The anointing of a king from a horn of oil is a magical act, bestowing on him the 'Divine Right of Kings' – which even David later abused. As soon as Samuel anointed the young David (1 Samuel 16), the 'spirit of the Lord' left Saul and descended upon him. This is the Jewish way of describing what the Romans would have called the Emperor's 'genius', a psychic concomitant of the power he wields in the material world.

48 Joseph and Solomon

Silver reliquary, end of the fourth century AD. Milan, San Nazaro Maggiore.

Both these Old Testament figures are shown as judges, making the open-palmed gesture of power. Joseph is pardoning his brothers who sold him into Egyptian hands (Genesis 45), and Solomon is calling the bluff of the two women who both claim the same infant (I Kings 3). In this probably Christian reliquary they probably stand for the twin function of Christ as Judge: on the one hand Mercy, on the other Severity. These names are given to the Sephiroth Chesed and Geburah, and they represent the workings of the Lord's will experienced subjectively as rewards and punishments.

49 Dish with Judaic Symbols

Gilded glass from the Jewish catacombs, Rome, fourth century AD. Jerusalem, Israel Museum.

The main symbols are the open tabernacle full of scrolls and the Menorah. Exoterically these represent the revelation of Moses to God's chosen people, and the lamp of faith which Jews throughout the world keep alight in their hearts. Esoterically they are the Kabbalistic wisdom concealed, layer beneath layer, in the first books of the Old Testament; and the cosmic and metaphysical order of the universe which these books reveal to the learned Jew.

50 Zodiac with Sun Chariot
Mosaic from the Synagogue, Beth Alpha (Israel), after AD 569.

Here is a Jewish adaptation of a favourite pagan scheme: the twelve zodiacal signs surrounding the Sun, with the four Seasons or Winds forming a cross. The far-reaching symbolism of the signs also lies behind the twelve gems on the High Priest's breastplate (Exodus 39) and the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem (Revelation 21), while the four Seasons are lower manifestations of the four Apocalyptic Beasts (Revelation 4) or Archangels who guard this earth.

VII Gnosticism

This most problematic of cults arose in Palestine in the first century BC – its exact origins are still disputed by scholars – and spread in the following century from a secondary centre in Alexandria. It was an extraordinary phenomenon: a religion of extremes, nurtured in the same atmosphere of apocalyptic syncretism into which Jesus came. In both Palestine and Egypt at the end of the Hellenistic age, unorthodox Jews mingled with Greek philosophers and Persian dualists; and somewhere in that confused but thrilling encounter Gnosticism was born, the religion of Gnosis – knowledge of the true nature of things. Of all the religions treated in this book, it is the most un-Roman: it needed the desert and the impetus of Oriental fanaticism. Decadent Alexandria was a more fertile soil for it than burgeoning Rome, but once it had taken root there, it put out adventitious sprouts of protean diversity all around the Mediterranean for four centuries and more.

The most radical tenet of Gnosticism is that the world is a stupendous mistake, created by a foolish or vicious creator-god. This creator or Demiurge is a god of a very low grade on the celestial hierarchy, himself the result of an error, who thinks that he is supreme. His pride and incompetence have resulted in the sorry state of the world as we know it, and in the blind and ignorant condition of most of mankind. The Gnostic, however, is not fooled. Although like every man he suffers under the tyranny of this monster, he knows that far above the Demiurge there is another God. He believes, moreover, that humanity is not totally without hope of reaching this true God whom the Demiurge does his best to hide, both from himself and from his subjects.

Given this fundamental attitude, Gnosticism is able to fasten like a parasite upon Platonism, Persian dualism or Christianity. The Platonists explain that from the higher gods emanate lower gods, in a vast hierarchy that stretches down from the One and the archetypal Ideas to the Demiurgic Jupiter, who made the planet we live on. The human soul, naturally a part of the higher planes, is sunk in matter and in ignorance, and its task is to journey laboriously upwards, leaving behind the world of substance to rejoin its native star, or even to be subsumed in the very Absolute itself. A Gnostic Platonist, such as Plotinus found cause to combat (Enneads 2, 9), would say that Jupiter was a tyrant and a usurper, and that all who challenged his powers (like the Titans, or Prometheus) deserved credit for looking above and beyond his miserable empire.

A Gnostic would also be sympathetic to the Persians, who saw the universe as the theatre for a perpetual battle between the powers of light and those of darkness. The Demiurge now becomes identified with Ahriman, the dark power, whose realm is matter; and Ahura Mazda, the God of Light, corresponds to the Deus absconditus, the hidden Supreme God. But the Gnostic by no means regards the two as equal: only on earth do the evil forces enjoy parity with, even superiority over, the good.

In respect to Judaism the Gnostics turn the whole Old Testament upside-down. Jehovah is the wicked Demiurge, and the whole testament is the story of his tyranny and egotism, as enforced on a people who were tricked into worshipping him as the Supreme God. An emissary of the true God appeared to Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden as the Serpent, and taught them what wisdom they could learn before Jehovah expelled them into the utter darkness of 'ordinary life'. Thereafter, all the villains of Jewish history – Cain, Esau, the Sodomites, etc. – become heroes for resisting his persecution.

The advent of Christ was recognized by the later Gnostics as a cosmic event of the utmost magnitude. For at the Baptism, there entered into the body of Jesus of Nazareth the direct influence of the True God. Christ is his son, not Jehovah's, and a god in his own right from a level far above the Demiurge. He descended to teach men the only thing that will get them out of their appalling predicament: knowledge of the true state of affairs.

The utter contempt in which the Gnostics held the entire created world and its creator did not make for the encouragement of the arts. Very little of Gnostic literature or artefacts has come down to us, for these people simply did not see any point in creating fresh errors or in leaving memorials behind them. Nearly all that we know of their doctrines comes from what their opponents and detractors had to say about them. Perhaps the most straightforward is Marcion, born a bishop's son in AD 85 and called by St Jerome a 'veritable sage'. He worked to separate Christianity totally from its Jewish roots, regarding the Old Testament merely as a catalogue of the Demiurge's crimes against humanity. He has Jesus descend to Hell after the Crucifixion to rescue the Old Testament 'villains' and all the Gentiles, leaving behind Abraham, Moses and all the other henchmen of Jehovah.

A similar bouleversement of accepted ideas is found also in the Gnostic ethical teachings, exemplified by Basilides' dictum: 'The perpetration of any voluptuous act whatever is a matter of indifference.' Basilides (early first century AD) and his successor Valentinus, the great masters of Alexandrian Gnosticism, favoured a strict amorality: the only rule was that there are no rules. If, as many initiates preferred, one's bent was ascetic, that was fine; if one was completely promiscuous, that was also fine: for the world is only an illusion in the brain of the non-God. Real life lies elsewhere, beyond human distinctions of good and evil. Some Gnostics, like Carpocrates, went further than Basilides' indifference and actually urged their followers to 'sin': to stoke the forbidden fires of desire so as to reduce them to ashes. They rejected private property and marital fidelity as typically restrictive inventions of the Demiurge, and held orgies in which the free indulgence of every perversion seems to have been mingled with ritual magic: a field in which Gnostic ideas are rife to this day. Yet the primary sources of later Gnosticism, the recently-discovered Nag Hammadi scrolls (hidden in the late fourth century AD), propose a much more sober doctrine based on the highest ethics. While their theology is as radical as any, the reader feels closer to Zen Buddhism than to modern Satanism when confronted with their koan-like paradoxes, and instructed by the true God: 'Do not be ignorant of me anywhere or at any time. Be on your guard!' (Nag Hammadi Library, p. 271).

51 Cock and Hen
Intaglio gem. London, British Museum.

Sex was as important, in a positive way, to certain Gnostic sects as it was, in a negative way, to the contemporary Christian ascetics. It was a means of experiencing the life force and of exhausting it, of propagating universal love, of asserting one's independence from the rules of conventional morality, and eventually of attaining unity with the Concealed God. The sexual magic publicized by Aleister Crowley gives a good impression of the nature and goals of some Gnostics, and his fate indicates some of the dangers involved in such a path, more fully discussed in the Introduction.

While this gem is not explicitly Gnostic, its sexual yet not salacious subject and the choice of the cock suggest a Gnostic origin. Cocks were recognized by all the Near Eastern peoples as sacred to the Sun, whom they greet at dawn. The cock's crow traditionally banishes the evil forces of the night, as for the Barbelognostics the unfettered indulgence of the sexual impulse brings freedom from the constricting laws of the evil Demiurge.

52 Abraxas

Bronze statuette. Lausanne, Archacological Museum.

The name Abraxas or Abrasax is often found in association with an armed figure with the head of a cock and serpents for legs. His identity is uncertain, some maintaining that he is the Supreme Principle and others that he is the same as Jehovah: a confusion not unknown in other religions. In view of the association of Abraxas images and inscriptions with magic, it seems likely that the entity in question is a daemon, of terrifying aspect but not necessarily evil nature, who can be invoked, like the ferocious aspects of certain Oriental gods, for protection. Hence he is often depicted on gemstones suitable for wearing as rings. The form in which he appeared to the inward eye lingered on in folk memory as the cockatrice or basilisk whose glance turns the beholder to stone.

53 Archontic Funeral Stele

From Hebron, fourth century A.D. Private collection.

Little enough imagery can definitely be identified as Gnostic in origin, and of that only a fraction is properly understood by anyone. Several stelae of this kind were found in Palestine and associated with the Archontic sect of Gnostics. This late sect rejected the official religions and relied on the soul's own powers to traverse the spheres of the manifested universe and reach the Great Mother above. They regarded the rulers of the seven planetary spheres as opponents of mankind, as indeed they are if the goal lies above those spheres (see Introduction). The apparently crude funeral stelae are probably more significant than one might suppose. One recognizes on them allusions to numerical and cosmological doctrines, in the divided circles, crosses and trees. They may be in the nature of spiritual biographies, recording the initiations of the deceased.

54 Moon Goddess

Stele from Argos, second or third century A.D. London, British Museum.

This effigy of a lunar goddess within the Zodiac belongs with the many other cosmic divinities pictured in this book; but it is associated with Gnosticism on account of an inscription on the underside of the stele:

Ιαία· φραινφρι· κανωθρα· λυκυσυντα· δωδεκακιστη· Σαβαωθ· αβωθερσας

These untranslatable words may have been added long after the stele was carved, adapting it to a new and magical purpose. They were of course invisible, facing the ground when the stele is set upright, but that is unimportant. What is significant in magic is the mere fact of their presence: a belief surviving in the topical objects placed beneath foundation stones or in space capsules, destined for the sight of beings we cannot imagine.

55 The Gnostic Trinity

Painting on vault of the Mausoleum of the Aurelii, Rome, first half of the third century AD.

The Naassene Gnostics had a doctrine of a Divine Triad comprising the First Man, the Second Man and the First Woman; and these three, Jérôme Carcopino suggested, are figured on the central medallion of this Christian Gnostic tomb. The First Woman is Sophia, the Divine Wisdom, corresponding to what orthodox Christianity called the Holy Spirit. In the second circle are four peacocks and four male figures. The iridescent tails of these birds relate them to the canopy of the stars, hence to the hope of immortality in the perfect realm above the Zodiac. The men have the attributes of both the first and the second persons of the Trinity, and hence represent Christ, who was an emanation from these, descending to save mankind. The women in the third zone are human souls like Sophia awaiting their saviour, while the hippocamps are the traditional vehicles for the journey of souls across the upper waters to the Fortunate Isles. For a fleeting moment, both Christian and pagan ideas are held in perfect harmony and balance.

VIII Christianity

The teachings of Jesus are simple and radical: 'Love your enemies'; 'The Kingdom of Heaven is within you'; 'My Father is greater than I'. No one knows, of course, which statements accredited to the Jesus of the Gospels were really spoken by him, so much have they been edited before reaching their canonical state. But when they actually go against official Church dogma or practice, it is safe to say that there is something authentic about them that has miraculously survived censorship. In these three statements, for example, we have an ethical system, a definition of Man, and a clarification of Jesus's own nature, quite at variance with the later teachings of most Christian Churches.

To love one's enemies and to 'turn the other cheek' is what Jesus himself did, and as such it represents the highest practice of the way of Love. Anyone can love themselves, most people can love their neighbours, a few can even extend the term to include the despised 'Samaritan'. But to love your enemies and not to resist their assaults: that is a counsel of perfection, and to follow it a true imitation of Christ. It is the same thing as 'loving God with all thy heart, mind and strength', because it involves perceiving and loving the Divinity within each human being. Who knows how many gallant attempts have been made by insignificant people: how many personal kindnesses, unsung sacrifices, and inner experiences of the love of God? The history books record mainly the unloving side of Christianity: the exclusivity which began with St Peter's rejection of the Gentile faithful, and gathered momentum until by the fourth century the bishops were torturing and executing Arians and other heretic Christians.

If the Kingdom of Heaven is within each human being, then one can seek and find it there, as well as in external institutions and practices. Here again, the mystics generally keep quiet about their experiences, and we do not know how many have found the Kingdom, and the Christ, within. We do know that the Roman Church has said that there is no salvation without its aid, and that the Protestant sects too set themselves up as indispensable bridges, or bastions, between a man and his own divine Spirit.

The third saying of Jesus should have been sufficient to prevent the confusion which is at the very root of official Christianity. The Absolute One; the Demiurge; the Christ; the Overseer of the Jewish people; Jesus of Nazareth: these are five distinct entities on five very different levels of being. A confusion of levels has led to the dogma which tries to unite them, and incidentally to the spilling of much ink and more blood.

At the same time, there has always been an esoteric Christian tradition, usually concealed for fear of exoteric persecution. Some of the Gnostic schools, the Celtic Church, the Cathars and Albigenses, the Fedeli d'Amore and Knights Templar, the Masons, Rosicrucians and Illuminati, and in the Orthodox Church the Hesychasts: these have kept the Light of the World burning – sometimes under a bushel, it is true – and together they form a chain of Christian Mysteries. Modern Theosophists and Anthroposophists claim to hand down the esoteric Christian tradition in their view of the status of Jesus Christ. According to this, Jesus of Nazareth was a man, the son of Mary and Joseph, raised to the highest moral and intellectual standards under the guidance of the Essenes (see Introduction). At the age of thirty, on the occasion of his Baptism, Jesus gave his body and mind to be vehicles on earth for a being of higher order than mankind, indeed one of the highest gods in the hierarchy of this solar system: the Christ. This god worked through Jesus for three years, then at the Crucifixion departed. The physical body of Jesus disappeared from the earth on Easter Day (just as has been observed in modern Tibet in the case of liberated sages). He manifested for a time in his astral body, teaching his closest disciples. The Imitation of Christ, for us humans, is therefore the offering of our bodies and souls so that our own 'Christ', our own divine Spirit, can manifest through them.

56 Cross with Logos Symbol

Episcopal throne, early medieval period.
Torcello Cathedral.

Whereas the open hand with all fingers outstretched is a sign of creation and power, the hand pointing with two fingers alone symbolizes thought, logos, and teaching. It is the hand of Christ as the Word of God, and here it is given a cosmic context by the Sun and Moon, placed within a cross that is Christ's but also the archetypal quaternity (see Pls 67, 142). Just as Mithras or Jupiter fills the whole cosmos for their devotees, so Christ's teaching and his saving Word dominate the universe for the Christian.

57 The Trinity at the Creation of Man
The 'Dogmatic Sarcophagus' from San Paolo fuori le Mura, Rome, fourth century AD. Rome, Museo Pio Clementino.

The dogmatic nature of this carving was probably directed against the Arian belief in the inequality of the Holy Trinity. The orthodox view is here given pictorial expression in that three identical bearded men, the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, preside over the Creation, raising Eve from the recumbent body of Adam. The robed younger figure who stands between the fully grown Adam and Eve is, in turn, identified as the Son, for he appears four further times elsewhere on the monument, performing four miracles. The changing of the water into wine, the multiplication of the loaves, the raising of Lazarus, and the restoration of sight to the blind are chosen to emphasize the creative power of Jesus, and to support the doctrine that he was not created by his Father but was present from the very beginning. He was there in the Garden of Eden, and witnessed the Fall of Man which he was to redeem.

The view of Arius holds that before the worlds were made, the Supreme Father created out of nothing a Logos, a subordinate creative and divine Principle; and that it was this which entered into Jesus of Nazareth, taking the place of his human spirit. The Logos is thus a god of a lower order than the Absolute One (how could it be otherwise?) and Jesus is its avatar. This view was debated at the Council of Nicaea in AD 325, and defeated by the faction which then became the decreers of orthodoxy for all of Christendom, supported by the strong secular arm of the Emperor Constantine.

58 St Callixtus

Gilded glass, fourth century AD. Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale.

The story of Pope Callixtus gives much insight into the situation of Christians around AD 200. Callixtus was a slave who managed a bank until on accusation from some Jews he was condemned to the Sardinian mines. He must already have made friends in high places, for his release was procured by one of the Emperor Commodus' favourite concubines, Marcia, who was also a Christian. Callixtus rose to the pontificate and, true to his old profession, proceeded to lay the foundation of the Church's wealth by acquiring property, including the catacombs which for two centuries were to be the Christians' cemeteries, chapels, poor-houses and hiding-places.

59 Christ's Nativity and the Three Magi

From a sarcophagus in the Christian Lapidarium, Arles.

Christ was traditionally born in a cave where an ox and an ass were stabled. That is to say, the inner Christ is born in the heart, where good and evil both dwell. The ass had long been a symbol of the dark powers, e.g. of Set, the Egyptian 'Satan', while the bovine is the true sacrificial beast, the most useful to mankind and to the earth. Beneath the nativity scene the three Magi, not yet shown as kings, notice the star. Their 'Persian' dress of Phrygian caps and trousers would have suggested that of Mithras, the Dioscuri, Attis and other Oriental deities; and perhaps the allusion is deliberate, as they prepare to kneel before the new-born god.

60 Christ, the Alpha and Omega
Ceiling painting, end of the fourth century
AD. Rome, Cemetery of Commodilla:
Cubicle of Leo.

The Christian perspective regards history not as cyclic but as running in a straight line from the Creation to Judgment Day. Christ was present at the beginning as the creative Word of God (see Pl. 57), and he will be there at the end as Judge. Hence the Alpha and Omega which flank him in the traditional Christian iconography.

61 Christ, Daniel and the Dragon

Gilded glass, fourth century AD. London, British Museum.

Many associations would have sprung up in the fourth-century mind in response to this image. According to the story in the Apocrypha, Daniel undertook to slay without a weapon the dragon worshipped by the Babylonians. He poisoned it with cakes of pitch, outraging its devotees who had him thrown into the lions' den in which he remained miraculously unharmed. Christ does not of course figure in the story, but here he seems to be Daniel's prompter, wearing for the first known time a halo. The choice of this odd subject may be explainable as a polemic against those Gnostics who identified Christ with the dragon or serpent of Eden.

62 Jonah and the Whale

Detail of an Alexandrian ivory diptych, early sixth century AD. Ravenna, Museo Nazionale.

Jonah, like his putative contemporary Arion, was thrown overboard by offended mariners and saved by the intervention of a sea-monster. The two stories aptly sum up the difference between the Judaic and Hellenic attitudes: for while Arion charmed the dolphin by his music and was carried to shore singing on the beast's back, Jonah was trying to run away from the will of the Lord, and had to spend a most uncomfortable three days' journey in the whale's belly. For Christian symbolism the Prophet is an anticipation of Christ, who rose from the tomb on the third day, and hence a symbol of every soul's resurrection.

IX Mithras and Aion

Mithraism was the Freemasonry of the Roman world. Whatever its ancestry in the ancient religion of Persia, it became something very different as soon as it left its native soil and took root in late Republican Rome. Like the other cults of Oriental origin, it moved with the vast commerce in human beings that is such a notable, and tragic, feature of the ancient world. Hundreds of thousands of slaves and soldiers, forcibly transported for life away from their homelands, could carry but one thing with them as they travelled: their faith. The cult of Mithras is one that travelled well, from Syria to Scotland, and it did not matter much that official recognition of it in Rome was comparatively tardy, in the later second century A.D. It is futile to try to correlate the widely scattered monuments and inscriptions with the ancient Persian religion, in the hope of coming up with a single Mithraic creed. But the social aspects are easily enough described. The adherents were bound to no exclusive allegiance, being permitted like present-day Masons to belong to any church, or none; but they were bound by secrecy, which they observed (as people always did in ancient times) with a holy dread. Hence our relations with Mithraism will always be determined more by curiosity than by certainty. The Mithraic community was all male: women gravitated to the parallel cult of Cybele or the exclusively female one of Bona Dea. The congregations were small: no surviving Mithracum could house more than a hundred, but of course bigger lodges may have formed, and dissolved, at army camps. There were no social barriers, so that slaves and privates could become high initiates. The ceremonies were solemnly enacted and the initiations quite awe-inspiring.

Whether Mithraism resembled Masonry further, in being based on the esoteric truths common to all branches of the Perennial Philosophy, is another matter. The divergence of symbolism from one Mithracum to another is quite startling, and scholars have admitted that the local artisans did not always understand what they were depicting. One can go further and say that in that case they must have lacked proper direction, and that perhaps the masters themselves were none too sure of their symbolism and exactly what it meant.

The very impossibility of fitting the basic Mithraic symbols satisfactorily with those of the esoteric inheritance of mankind suggests that the whole affair may have been an invented religion rather than a revealed one, perhaps on a level with Mormonism which similarly takes as its starting point an ancient and authentic revelation.

When one studies Mithraic symbolism, one is struck by the constant shifting of levels: from the astronomical to the metaphysical, from the psychological to the ontological. Who is the Mithras of the Mysteries? He is one of the gods, lower than Ahura Mazda (the Supreme Deity of Light of the Persians) but higher than the visible Sun. He is creator and orderer of the universe, hence a manifestation of the creative Logos or Word. Seeing mankind afflicted by Ahriman, the cosmic power of darkness, he incarnated on earth. His birth on 25 December was witnessed by shepherds. After many deeds (some of them described with the plates) he held a last supper with his disciples and returned to heaven. At the end of the world he will come again to judge resurrected mankind and after the last battle, victorious over evil, he will lead the chosen ones through a river of fire to blessed immortality. It is possible to prepare oneself for this event during life by devotion to him, and to attain a degree of communion with him through the sacramental means of initiation.

No wonder the early Christians were disturbed by a deity who bore so close a resemblance to their own, and no wonder they considered him a mockery of Christ invented by Satan, their own Dark Lord. In a certain way they may have been right. It is my suspicion – which, unfortunately, cannot be bolstered by scholarly evidence – that Roman Mithraism was born from some clairvoyant sense of the coming of Christ, seen through the perspective of Zoroastrian dualism. It is precisely the connections with Christianity that make Mithraism so interesting, and so confusing. Persian dualism is a faith of the Age of Aries (second-first millennia BC), which is the sign of the Sun's exaltation and Mars' rulership; so Mithras, the solar warrior, is still re-enacting the close of the previous Age of Taurus (fourth-third millennia BC) by slaying the cosmic Bull. All the Arien leaders are fighters: the ram-horned Moses, Ammon and Mars/Ares himself. Jesus Christ, on the other hand, immolates the age of war in the only way possible: by sacrificing himself as the Ram or Lamb of God. In doing so he ushers in the Age of Pisces (second-first millennia AD), the era which cherishes in its heart an ideal of devotion and love.

63 Egg-birth of Mithras
Relief from Housesteads Fort,
Northumberland, second century AD.
Newcastle-on-Tyne, Museum of
Antiquities.

In one of his many syncretistic guises, Mithras springs fully-armed from the broken halves of the cosmic egg, like Phanes Protogonus, the first-born god of light in the Orphic theogony (cf. Pl. 142). The world-egg represents the entirety, in potentia, of one cosmic cycle, and its sundering symbolizes the polarity of positive and negative forces without which no world could unfold in time and space. Mithras is both the personified creator who breaks the egg, and the mediator between the opposites who eventually heals the rift and reconciles the warring factions. He is born in the sign of Capricorn, i.e. at the winter solstice: the light of the world enters on the darkest day of the year.

64 Mithras as Sun God

Votive stele from Carrawbrough,
Northumberland, second century AD.
Newcastle-on-Tyne, Museum of
Antiquities.

Beyond the mention of his name in the inscription, 'Deo invicto Mitrac', there is nothing to distinguish this figure from Sol. He holds in his right hand a whip to drive his quadriga, and his rays pierce the stone to allow the light of a lamp to shine through from behind. Mithras is sometimes identified with the Sun, yet sometimes put in actual opposition to it. According to one legend he stole the Sun God's cattle, slaughtered the cosmic Bull, and thus made possible the generation of mankind. The myths of cattle-stealing or cattle-herding gods, such as Hermes and Krishna, allude to the appropriation by spiritual monads of human bodies prepared through physical generation, or in Platonic language to the vivification of soma by nous. It is the task of religions to lead these monads up again to their proper home.

65 The Child Mithras turning the Zodiac
Gallic relief. Trier, Rheinisches Landesmuseum.

The divine Child holds in his hand the globe of the earth, just as the Christ Child in medieval icons holds the royal orb surmounted by his symbol, the cross. Both are imagined as lords of a limited, geocentric cosmos: a manifested physical universe which extends as far as the eye can see, i.e. to the stars of the Zodiac, placed 'foursquare' between the winds or archangels. The beasts below, often shown in the tauroctones (bull-slaying monuments), probably represent the elements and four signs of the Zodiac connected with generation: Serpent-Fire-Leo (cf. the shape of the 'Leo' symbol); Dog-Earth-Virgo (dogs are sacred to Mercury, ruler of the sign); Raven-Air-Libra; Scorpion-Water-Scorpio. But Mithraic iconography is so inconsistent – the Scorpion is absent here, for example – that one cannot offer any blanket explanations of its meaning.

< 66 Rock-birth of Mithras
Roman relief. Dublin, Trinity College Library.

If the egg-birth within the Zodiac symbolizes the creative action of the spiritual principle in a limited cosmos, the rock-birth shows the opposite: the breaking of the spirit out of the solidity of physical matter. The struggle of the spirit to free itself from the adamantine bonds of the body is a second birth, achieved by the great avatars and sages during their life, and performed with more or less difficulty at every man's death. Birth into one world is always death to another, and vice versa.

67 Mithras receiving his Command
Relief from Dieburg, before AD 260.
Dieburg, Kreismuseum.

The central, seated figure of Zeus-Ahura Mazda is delegating his authority to a cloaked Mithras of the sun-charioteer type. Leroy Campbell (see Bibliography) identifies the four women around the throne as the four Seasons, and the youths leading horses as the four Elements. This is a creative act: the cyclic motion of time, represented by the Seasons, is reflected in the rotation of the Elements. Note that the ages of the Elements and their degrees of motion increase, from the static boy feeding his horse at upper left, round clockwise to the vigorous young man with his trotting steed at lower left. The same archetypal quaternity will be carried down to the foursquare earth, outside the heavenly circle, by the four Winds who blow at the corners. At the bottom of the circle are reclining figures with amphora and cornucopia, and a head of the Oceanus type. One frequently finds this configuration (e.g. Pl. 83) as a symbol of the fruitful Earth, with its rivers and the seas. But here the figures are the immaterial ideas of the world, still held within the charmed circle of the heavenly mind.

68 Tauroctone

Relief from Dura Europos, AD 170-1. Yale University, Gallery of Fine Arts.

The central image of Mithraic iconography is his slaying of the cosmic Bull which Ormuzd, god of light, had created, in order to save it from the clutches of Ahriman, god of darkness. The myth can be interpreted on several levels. Terrestrially it represents the sun's gift of fertility to crops and creatures: the pouring of vitality into the ground or into the womb from which new life can arise. This is the level explored in Frazer's The Golden Bough. Psychologically it is the sacrifice or sublimation of the sexual powers, of which the bull is an obvious symbol, in the interests of higher development, as practised by monks and yogis. Astronomically it marks the end of the Taurean Age of mankind (fourth-third millennia BC) which preceded the Arien Age (second-first millennia BC) to which the Persian myths belong. Theologically it is the action of one of the lower gods, like Jehovah or Jupiter, who 'slay' the archetypal Ideas to create the physical matter without which our world could not exist. (Ahriman, mistakenly called a principle of evil, is only 'dark' because he represents an unknowable, higher level of gods, who have no possible commerce with matter or with the limited time and space signified by the circumscribing Zodiac.) Physically it is the transmutation of matter into energy, taking place between the positive and negative potencies. Metaphysically it is the encounter between the infinite cosmic substance (Taurus) and the binding cosmic idea (Gemini).

69 Tauroctone

Relief from Heddernheim. Wiesbaden, Städtisches Museum.

Just like the Crucifixion, the Mithraic sacrifice takes place between Sun and Moon and under the eye of the Father God (Jupiter, in the preceding plate). The good and bad thieves also have their correspondences in the two torch-bearers Cautes and Cautopates, who have as many meanings as the sacrifice itself. They are at every level reflections of the primal duality of light and darkness, life and death, spirit and matter, etc. Cautopates, with lowered torch, rules the autumn equinox and winter solstice, the barren half of the year; Cautes, with raised torch, is the return of fertility in spring and summer. But in southern Iranian reliefs their symbolism is reversed, because there the scorching summer sun withers the vegetation which flourishes in the cooler, wetter months. Much of Mithraic iconography seems to belong in the venerable tradition of vegetation symbolism. But to those versed in the Hermetic-Platonic tradition, Cautopates also signifies the extinction of the soul's light on its entry into the body, and Cautes its rebirth after 'death'. This relief, so rich in imagery, includes also the solar and lunar chariots, Mithras' capture of the cosmic Bull and his reconciliation with Sol, and the four beasts. Leroy Campbell has made the most thorough investigation of the iconography, but even his results are inconclusive.

Wall-painting in the Capua Mithraeum, third century AD.

In this detail from a painted tauroctone, Sol is both personifier of the positive pole, balanced by negative Luna on the opposite side, and of Mithras' father and director Ormuzd with his messenger-bird the raven. A major philosophical difficulty is involved here. On the one hand Mithras is the mediator between the cosmic opposites Ormuzd and Ahriman (superficially called good and evil), and as such he reconciles this ethical split in the psyche of mankind. On the other hand, he takes sides with the good against the evil, thus exacerbating the conflict. How can they both be true? The further East one goes, the better this seems to be understood. Vedantists and Buddhists know that, on the earthly level, evil certainly exists and must be fought. But it has no metaphysical reality, and a higher standpoint shows it as merely the mirror image of an equally unreal 'good'.

71 Mithraic Magus

Wall-painting in the Dura Europos
Mithraeum, third century AD.

The nudity of Greek gods and of the Greeks themselves was repugnant to the people of the Middle East, whose fear of their own sexuality led even before the Muslims to excesses such as the veiling of women. This overdressed Magus, and indeed Mithras himself in his cloak and trousers, must have seemed as exotic to the Graeco-Roman world as the Japanese in kimonos did to nineteenth-century Europe. One garment, the 'Phrygian' cap, became a universal symbol of the Oriental cults, being worn by Mithras, Attis, the Kabeiroi, the Dioscuri, and their servitors. Later it became the headgear of medieval Masons, the sans-culottes, and La Liberté herself. Its symbolism is one of supreme spiritual attainment, represented also in Osiris' white ra's topknot, Shou-hsing's im, and the tiaras of Shiva and

72 Aion with Keys

Statue from Sidon, fourth century AD.
Private collection, Paris.

The imposing effigy of the leontocephalic god is often found in proximity to Mithraic monuments, and to him has been given the designation of Aion: the boundless 'Time' which presides unmoved and unmoving over the entire universe. His keys unlock the two solstitial gates. The silver one is to the Gate of Cancer which leads to the Way of the Ancestors (Pitri-yana) and to reincarnation. The golden one is to the Gate of Capricorn, the Way of the Gods (Deva-yana) which leads beyond the Circle of Necessity, i.e. to release from the round of birth and death. These are the two routes through which the soul can exit from the world at death, and the Capricorn gate is the one through which the gods descend to earth, Mithras as well as Christ being born at the winter solstice. Buddhists would probably identify Aion with Shin-je, Judge of the Dead, the monstrous figure who turns the wheel of the six worlds.

73 Aion with Apron

Statue from the Villa Albani, late first century AD. Vatican Museum.

Aion's four wings and serpent represent time with its fourfold divisions and cyclic motion. With his open lion's mouth he devours his progeny at the end of each cycle of cosmic manifestation. Like Shiva, another supreme god of cyclic creation and destruction, Aion here has four arms, though what the front ones held we do not know: probably sceptre and keys. The back pair clutch arrows carved onto the wings. The accompanying symbols here are definitely chthonic: three-headed Cerberus, the guard-dog of the underworld, and a mass of snakes. To an ordinary Mithraist the conception of Aion as a god of Hades like Pluto or Serapis was probably more familiar than the lofty explanations of Orphism. The lions' heads would denote courage, and the eye on the breast intelligence – though it is of course the 'eye of the heart' through which the soul knows truth. The apron, an Egyptian garment later adopted by Freemasonry, may serve to emphasize the purity to which devotees of Mithras aspired. This figure, in fact, may well represent the attitude with which a Mithraist hopes to approach, and transcend, the world of shades.

74 Aion on Globe

Relief from the Villa Albani, period of Commodus (AD 180–93). Rome, Museo Torlonia.

Unlike the cosmic gods who are shown inside the Zodiac, Aion stands above a Zodiac-encircled globe or wears the signs on his body. Here the signs are indicated by the twelve divisions of his sceptre. The two bands crossing the globe recall the World Soul's method of creation in Plato's Timaeus, by crossing the two circles of world-stuff in the form of an X. Aion is a creator, but not of worlds: he emanates metaphysical principles or gods. In the Persian theogony he is Zervan, whose two sons are the opposites Ormuzd and Ahriman between which Mithras mediates. So he is in a way the highest aspect of Mithras, being beyond rather than between the opposites.

X Cybele and Attis

The Great Mother Goddess has seldom lacked devotees. In every culture of mankind she appears, sometimes loving and nurturing, at other times devouring and destroying. In her first aspect, personified by goddesses like Isis, Hera, Fricka and Mary, she protects women (especially in childbirth, being herself a mother), maintains the proprieties of marriage and the family, and rules the hearth and home. She is a never-failing source of comfort to whom one appeals for help as one did, as a child, to one's own mother. The Romans knew this archetype in their indigenous goddess Juno, the wife of Jupiter, but the feminine was never very strong in the State religion, dominated as it was by warrior gods and national heroes. The other aspect of the Goddess concerns the unknown, the mysterious and magical, of which women have a greater intuitive understanding than men. While the extroverted gods are at work in the world, the Great Mother stays at home and rules in the interior realm of the unconscious. Here she is Luna, Astarte, Hecate, Kali: the goddess of nocturnal rites and orgiastic plummetings into the abyss of the subconscious. It is this aspect that official Roman religion, and Roman life, seem to have lacked. The dour, masculine character of Republican Rome needed a counterbalance, an escape valve for aspirations which the State religion ignored. So when in 204 B.C. on the advice of the Delphic Oracle, the Romans fetched the Great Mother from Pessinus (near modern Sivrihisar in central Turkey), their act had a psychological rightness, involving an acceptance of irrational and uncontrollable forces.

Cybele's homeland was Anatolia, a land for which the Romans had a sentimental attachment since it was thence, after the Trojan War, that Aeneas had sailed with his Trojan heroes to found the City of Rome. Cybele took shape there as a black stone the size of a fist, probably a meteorite, set as the face of a silver statue. What the Pessinians felt about surrendering their cultic image we do not know, but Cybele was duly installed in a temple on the Palatine Hill and worshipped there for over five hundred years.

Of the several legends concerning Attis, the standard one in the Imperial period tells that he was a Phrygian shepherd of unusual comeliness who was beloved of the Mother of the Gods. It is doubtful that their love was ever consummated, which is probably why Attis fell in love with a nymph, traditional prey of classical shepherds. The Mother was so incensed by his infidelity that she caused him to become insane, in which condition he castrated himself and died. After death he was reborn and reunited with her. Cybele and Attis are worshipped as a pair, but they are not equals like Jupiter and Juno, or Isis and Osiris: Attis is deified, but remains definitely secondary to his mother, just as in the Arian view Jesus is not the equal of God the Father. And if generations of Christians believed that Jesus died on the cross as the only means to pacify his father's anger at mankind, it was no more absurd for the devotees of Attis and Cybele to worship a jealous goddess and her mutilated son.

The parallels, as in the case of Mithraism, are worth pursuing further. The most solemn ritual of Cybele's worship, if we can judge from the evidence of numerous inscriptions, was the taurobolium, or bull-sacrifice. The bull was slaughtered on a perforated platform, through which the blood poured down to bathe the initiate standing in a pit beneath. One could celebrate a taurobolium, like a Mass, either for one's own benefit or for that of another, especially the Emperor. Afterwards the devotee was considered in some sense 'born again'. Poorer people made do with a criobolium, in which a ram was killed, and were 'washed in the blood of the Lamb'. Both Mithraism and Christianity seem to have sublimated this crudely physical rite: the Mithraists by placing the icon of the tauroctonous Mithras in the place of honour in their sanctuaries, but not actually performing the slaughter there, and the Christians by drinking their saviour's blood in the form of sacramental wine.

The precise relation of the taurobolium to Cybele's worship is unknown, since her dogmas and liturgies are lost. But she was certainly a goddess who demanded sacrifice, and the taurobolium was probably a vicarious substitute for the shedding of human blood. For some of her devotees, however, this was not sufficient. In her native Orient, the most fervent of them would pledge eternal fealty to her by following the example of Attis and emasculating themselves. Thereafter they were totally devoted to her service, assuming the role of mendicant ascetics and the name of Galli ('Cocks'). The Romans reacted with a mixture of fascination and horror to these unmanned hierophants, who, at least in the West, affected extravagant costumes, make-up and jewellery. History was to repeat itself in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when Rome was again full of idolized and effeminate castrati, their manhood sacrificed not to religion but to Art.

The great festival of Cybele and Attis took place around the vernal equinox. In the middle of the fourth century AD, presumably following ancient tradition, the spring rites would begin on 15 March with the entry of the 'reed-bearers', whose exact significance is uncertain. A week later, at the equinox proper, was the 'entry of the tree', the evergreen pine under which Attis died and which was revered and mourned as a symbol of the god himself. It is impossible to ignore the associations with Jesus' entry into Jerusalem surrounded by palm-bearers, and his bearing of the cross or tree which became his chief symbol. And this is not all: on 22 March the tree, decked with funereal purple, was laid to rest in the temple of the Mother as in a sepulchre. The next day was one of vociferous mourning, and on the day following, the 'day of blood', the Mother's worshippers would whip themselves and some of them, carried away by ecstasy, would perform the irreversible act. With the dawn of 25 March came the day of rejoicing for some – convalescence for others – as Attis' resurrection was celebrated.

Not long after, on 4 April, fell the commemoration of Cybele's entry into Rome, and on 10 April the anniversary of the dedication of her temple on the Palatine. These feasts of the Mother, marked by banquets, games and dramas, were the contribution of the Roman aristocrats, in contrast to the fanatic and essentially foreign Attis-rites of March. The two groups of festivals reflect the dual aspects of Cybele mentioned above: on the one hand the all-demanding and devouring mistress; on the other, the benign giver of life and the fruits of the earth. Again we can see the two options open to the spiritual aspirant, the way of denial and the way of acceptance.

75 Cybele in the Zodiac

Relief from Transjordan, early second century A.D. Cincinnati, Art Museum, and private collection, Amman.

Nelson Glueck made the happy discovery that these two fragments belong to a single sculpture of a Victory supporting a goddess in the Zodiac. Cybele-Tyche-Atargatis assumes a rôle like that of Jupiter in Pl. 2, representing the power that fills the visible universe. This power can be imagined female, just as well as male, and the races of man have worshipped it in both guises, depending on their prejudices and social structure. The most primitive cultures known to anthropologists seem to be matriarchal; later ones are patriarchal, and their supreme god changes sex accordingly.

76 Cybele riding a Lion

Roman coin, second century AD. London, British Museum.

The two great goddesses of the Zodiac are the Mother, whose sign is Cancer, and the Virgin, whose sign is Virgo. Of course Cybele's domination over the king of beasts is an evocative image of her strength, but the astrological symbolism goes further than that. As Virgo follows Leo in the Zodiac, so the power of the universe represented by the Lion is harnessed and tamed by the Virgin goddess of Nature, who in turn gives birth to all living creatures.

77 Mother Goddess with Twins

Terracotta, c. AD 300. London, British Museum.

Terracotta statuettes such as this one were mass-produced in the ancient world, like popular Roman Catholic art today, as votive objects for the home. In this particular case, even the image has remained unchanged through the millennia: and no wonder, for as long as there are mothers and children, with all their attendant concerns, so long will devotion to the Great Mother Goddess continue, whether she is called Isis, Astarte, Cybele or Mary. The projection of human motherhood onto a goddess is logically absurd, yet these archaic beliefs hold a symbolic truth far stronger than the shallow rationalism that tries to demolish them: they conceal an intuition of a living universe of beings in which each has others under its care. No one is alone, no creature is totally abandoned or forgotten by their higher principles which have the task of vivifying, nurturing and eventually weaning them, so that they can become 'mothers' in their turn.

78 Procession in Honour of Cybele
Wall-painting in the Via dell' Abbondanza,
Pompeii, c. first century AD.

In the annual celebration of Cybele's entry into Rome, the life-sized image of the goddess was placed on a litter and attended by worshippers with musical instruments and libation bowls. Processions in which the deity is carried along a prescribed route are a universal element of religions. Their arcane purpose is connected with the occult properties of the earth itself, and with reinforcing the telluric currents that affect those who live near them. A procession, traditionally interspersed with stations (of which one is depicted here), traces the route of the currents and, by carrying over them an image or other object charged with spiritual power, serves to fix and sanctify them and to benefit the people taking part in the rite. In medieval Christianity the Corpus Christi Day procession was the principal ritual of this kind, in which the consecrated Host was carried around the town. The processions at coronations and the funeral cortège of a celebrity, still practised today, serve similarly to distribute the virtue of the monarch or hero among his people.

79 Pensive Attis

Wall-painting in the House of Pinarius Cerealis, Pompeii, first century AD.

Cupid runs away in horror as Attis contemplates the knife with which he intends to castrate himself. His languid position with crossed legs, also found in the Mithraic supporter Cautopates, may refer to the 'crucifixion' of physical existence from which Attis will soon be free. The sickle-shaped knife is a reminder that Cybele, among her other powers, is a moon goddess, whose wrath can drive men to lunatic actions. This particular representation probably depicts a scene from a stage-play, for the tale of Attis and Cybele was a favourite subject for drama. One can imagine the lost Soliloquy of Attis as he weighs the consequences of his deed.

80 Dying Attis

Relief from Glanum, second century BC. St Rémy-de-Provence, Museum.

Attis is here shown dying as he lies contortedly between cypress and palm trees on the banks of the river Gallos. His Pan-pipes and other instruments hang silent, and his cloak billows up as he clutches at his wound. Like Christ on Golgotha, he might well say 'My Goddess, why hast thou forsaken me?' Yet this darkest moment will be succeeded by resurrection and reunion with his parent-lover.

81 Transfigured Attis

Statue from Ostia, second century AD. Vatican, Museo Laterano.

The previous plate showed the agonizing aspect of Attis' deed; this shows him serene and kingly, released from worldly pleasures and their attendant miseries. From his head shine solar rays. The river Gallos, now not a seductive nymph but a wise old river god, supports his elbow. Attis' swelling abdomen and soft face are like a woman's; he has become an androgyne, above and beyond sex.

82 Dancing Attis

Bronze statuette. Paris, Louvre.

Although there is nothing in the literary sources to explain this favourite Attis figure – the young boy, sometimes winged like Eros, dancing and triumphant – its meaning is plain. His Phrygian garments, left unbuttoned from thighs to belly, starkly emphasize his unmitigated condition. He who was castrated and died is now reborn, whole and healed, as a being for whom sexuality is no longer (or not yet) a source of suffering. The winged boy symbolizes the soul of the reborn devotee, free to dance before the gods in spiritual ecstasy and holy love. Having 'become as a little child', he inherits the kingdom of heaven.

83 Ascension of Attis and Cybele

Silver dish from Parabiago, fourth century A.D. Milan, Castello Sforzesco.

This magnificent silver charger celebrates the ascension of the Great Mother with her son-lover. The key to its meaning is given by the Emperor Julian in his Oration to the Mother of the Gods. Attis, he says, is the lowest of the actual 'gods', being the direct creator of our earth. (The higher gods create on ideal planes, above the material one.) At the bottom of the plate we can see his work: rivers, ocean, fruitful Tellus and the Seasons. The earth is good, yet lest Attis' powers be totally dispersed in working with matter, he is recalled by his Mother. The myth tells that he was 'betrayed by a lion', i.e. by the ether, mediating element between matter and spirit, and castrated, i.e. deprived of his lower creative faculties.

Attis, released from his work, gazes ecstatically at his bride as their lion-drawn quadriga bears them aloft, surrounded by dancing Corybantes clashing their swords against their shields. The Corybantes are the highest forces below the gods, and traditional protectors of youthful gods, i.e. the daemonic or angelic beings who channel the creative forces into the world. Attis and Cybele ascend towards the heavens, represented in the upper zone as the chariots of the Sun and Moon, with the Morning and Evening Stars.

A clue to the esoteric meaning of the picture is found on the right where Atlas sinks, bearing aloft the Genius of a novus ordo seclorum, a new cycle succeeding Atlantis. This was one of the Mystery teachings of which Plato was permitted to reveal a fragment; it seems that he knew of the periodic creation and destruction of civilizations, aptly symbolized by Attis' creative work and the periodic withdrawal of his powers. At the end of a cycle everything returns to the great maternal ocean. The alternate solidification and dissolution of worlds is an eternal cycle, though not a pointless one like the Stoics' and Nietzsche's 'eternal recurrence'. It has a direction, and that is why the Serpent of Time, on the extreme right of the plate, winds around a pointed obelisk.

XI Isis and Serapis

Egypt held a powerful attraction for the Romans, very much like the fascination which the Orient has exerted more recently on the Western world. Egypt was a place of unfathomable antiquity and strange mores, a land of exotic landscapes whose inhabitants performed inexplicable rituals. A fashion for Egyptianizing motifs and ambience gripped the wealthy Romans of the early Empire like the chinoiserie craze of the eighteenth century. The Munich pagoda or the Japanese garden at Woburn Abbey are parallels to Hadrian's Euripus, the miniature Nile landscape with a Serapeum set in the Emperor's pleasure-garden at Tivoli. In religion, too, the alien cultures have infiltrated the modern West, though it has taken longer for Europe and America to have their own Buddhist temples and ashrams. In the case of Rome, the religion came first, travelling as always in the ancient world with the traffic in goods and slaves. Isis was being worshipped in the Piraeus, the port of Athens, by the fourth century B.C. By the second century B.C. she had Roman worshippers too on the holy island of Delos, now a great centre of the slave trade. She crept up to Rome through Magna Graecia, leaving impressive memorials, for instance, at Herculaneum and Pompeii, and by the time of Julius Caesar she and Serapis had a temple and an altar on the Capitoline Hill. Apart from some temporary setbacks, the Egyptian cult was to last in Rome for four centuries, from the reign of Augustus to that of Julian, and enjoy immense prestige and imperial patronage.

Isis was the perfect goddess for this time and place, because she came already wearing an aura of syncretism and universality. In an Egyptian hymn of the first century B.C. she is addressed thus:

All mortals dwelling on the infinite earth,
Thracians and Greeks, even barbarians,
Pronounce thy blessed name, honoured by all,
Each in his own tongue and in his own land.
The Syrians address thee as Astarte,
Or as Nanaia, or as Artemis.
Thy subjects of Lycia call thee Leto;

The men of Thrace: 'Great Mother of the Gods'.
In Greece they call thee Hera throned on high,
Or Aphrodite, or well-wishing Hestia,
Rhea or Demeter too. But the Egyptians
Give thee the name Thioui, for thou art,
And thou alone, all of the goddesses
Which divers people call by divers names.

(First Hymn of Isidoros, from the small sanctuary of Madinet Madi in the Fayoum)

Isis is a personification of the same archetype as Cybele, the Great Mother: she is all things feminine, from the first unformed matter of the universe down to the cows which are sacred to her. But she had an advantage over the Anatolian and Syrian goddess in that she came from a civilization with thousands of years of profound religious knowledge behind it. Egyptian religion was admittedly in a state of decline as early as the fourth dynasty, when the Pharaoh Cheops usurped an antediluvian Mystery temple for his own tomb. But even in the fourth century AD the hierophants of Egypt still held the keys to other worlds, and to judge from Apuleius and Iamblichus they were able to unlock the door for suitable candidates, taking them through the death experience (the 'gates of Proserpine') and giving them an unforgettable glimpse of spiritual entities.

Isis and Osiris, according to Plutarch, were originally daemons who were promoted to the order of gods. Even in the higher worlds there is continual evolution and migration, though time, death and individuality are not such as we know them on earth. The usual myth of Isis and her brother-husband places them as sovereigns of predynastic Egypt; and there is no incompatibility between the two accounts. This, in fact, is precisely the reason for the success of Isis, and for the great devotion paid to her for so long. Like Jesus and Mary, she and Osiris were incarnated as humans and suffered all the vicissitudes of human life, before ascending to their own realm. Hence the warm and passionate identification felt by Isiacs and Christians alike. One cannot say the same of Mithras or Attis: there is something coldly theological about them. And as for Cybele, compare her treatment of Attis with Isis' treatment of Osiris. Far from jealously encouraging his mutilation, Isis sought and reassembled the scattered pieces of his body; and when she could not find the phallus, she made him an artificial one with which she conceived their son Horus.

And what of Serapis, that mysterious and little-understood god who arrives on the scene with the foundation of Alexandria? He seems to be a conflation of Zeus, Pluto and Asklepios, and he rules as

84 Isis Pelagia

Fragment from a lamp, second century A.D.
Delos, Museum.

Isis has many connections with water and those who sail upon it. As a feminine goddess (and a moon goddess at that) she rules the element with all its manifold symbolism. The spring festival, Navigium Isidis, was celebrated on 5 March, invoking her blessing as navigation was resumed after the winter, and ensuring the safe arrival of the Egyptian corn that fed Rome. One of the principal rituals of the festival was the procession of her ship, described in vivid detail by Apuleius. But ships do not only carry corn: they bear souls across the river of death to Paradise. May Isis rather than Charon be our pilot!

85 Priestess of Isis

Statue from Hadrian's Villa, second century A.D. Rome, Capitoline Museum.

This could equally well be a statue of Isis herself, for the priestess in her ritual clothing supreme Lord with Isis, though his precise relationship to her, marital or otherwise, is not clear since no myths are told of them. Scholars think him an invention of King Ptolemy Soter, who claims to have been instructed in a dream to find the image of this god. They say that Serapis was a personification of the Apis Bull, an animal avatar of Osiris worshipped at Memphis, the former capital of Egypt, and that Ptolemy, when he established his new capital city, redesigned the god in human form in order to make the Egyptian religion more palatable to Alexandrian Greeks, thus uniting the races under his rule. To leave it at that betokens a cynical view of the gods and their origin, which in the case of Serapis is belied by his obvious power and the devotion he inspired in his worshippers throughout the Graeco-Roman-Egyptian world. He was the presiding deity of Alexandrian civilization, and of all that that city gave to the world, just as Ammon was the god of Thebes, Athena of Athens, Hagia Sophia of Byzantium, and Wotan of the Third Reich. These 'overseers' are just as real as the cultures over which they preside, and they are 'invented' only in the original and literal sense of the word: they are discovered when the time is ripe.

and gestures imitates and in a certain sense incarnates the goddess for the worshippers. The sistrum which she brandishes in her right hand is the most characteristic of Isis' attributes. All creative divinities can appropriately be furnished with musical instruments, since all vibrations, including sound, are powerful creative forces. Thus Pan and Attis have their shepherd's pipes, the Mother her tambourine and cymbal, Apollo his lyre, all representing different levels of creative activity. The form of the Isiac sistrum is that of a temenos or sacred enclosure in which the four bars rattle around, representing the interplay of the four elements, their alchemical rotation, and the vibratory forces that organize them into the world we know. All this is under Isis' rule, in her aspect as Mother Nature. In her left hand – the hand of passivity – she holds a pitcher for milk, used in the ceremonies to symbolize Nature's spontaneous nurturing of her creatures. In some of her rites the place of the vessel was taken by a golden model of a breast.

86 Isis Fortuna
Silver statuette from Macon. London,
British Museum.

Isis-Fortuna is recognizable by her solar-feather crown, and holds a spilling cornucopia and the rudder with which she steers the course of one's life. (Again active and passive functions are allotted to the right and left hands.) The Stoics declined to believe in Fortuna, rejecting the attitude of the masses who believed that such a goddess, if properly courted, might send undeserved good luck. Of course, that is an unphilosophical view, but there is another way of interpreting this ever-popular figure: as the law of each person's destiny, which may at any time produce unforeseen changes. She is in this interpretation the karma of a person, city or state. Thus Plutarch could say that Tyche (as he called her) had abandoned the Assyrians and Persians and moved to the Palatine. To identify her with Isis is to entrust one's fate to the will of the goddess: 'Thy will, not mine, be done.'

87 Isis, Harpocrates and Anubis

Terracotta, probably from Fayoum, found in Campania, second century AD. London, British Museum.

Isis is a model of wifely fidelity, ever devoted to Osiris despite his adultery with her sister Nephthys from which Anubis was born. This jackal-headed or cynocephalus god is charged with the care of the soul during its posthumous journey, and in Egypt this made him the patron of mummification and the other manipulations of the physical body which can speed or retard the soul's progress. Harpocrates is the Graeco-Egyptian name for Horus, Isis' own son, who puts his finger to his lips in a gesture that overtly signifies his infancy but covertly enjoins silence on those who understand him. As the son of Osiris he is a symbol of the soul, reborn like the child Attis (Pl. 82) in its purified state. His cornucopia is a sign of spiritual fullness and completion. Perhaps one can see here a parallel to the popular Christian group of the Virgin and her divine child Jesus with his cousin John the Baptist, his forerunner who in the Baptism bestowed on him his godhead.

88 Serapis in Majesty

Statuette, second century AD. London, British Museum.

The features of the early Serapis statues, based on Bryaxis' original of the fourth century BC, most resemble those of Zeus, and the identification is emphasized here by the attendant eagle. But Serapis is clothed like Pluto, and on his right is Cerberus, the three-headed guard-dog of Hades. Like Asklepios he is also a god of healing and oneiromantic revelation: the Serapeum of Alexandria was a centre for incubation and other occult therapies. But most of all Serapis epitomizes that meeting-point of Greece and Egypt which was to be the new spiritual centre of the ancient world, as Rome was its political centre.

89 Head of Serapis

Statue, after AD 100. London, British Museum.

Around the second century AD the features of Serapis' statues undergo a slight change, softening almost into androgyny and acquiring forelocks – a hairstyle which several Roman emperors were to imitate (e.g. Pl. 24). On the god's head is his characteristic attribute, the modius (basket) which is said to indicate fertility but actually corresponds to the opening of the highest centre in the body. Yogic authorities might be able to explain the difference between the open basket of Serapis and the closed Phrygian caps of the Oriental deities discussed in Chapter IX. By this time Serapis was 'solarized' and assimilated to all the other sun gods; a similar head was found in the Walbrook Mithracum, London, whose members evidently accepted both the Persian and the Egyptian god.

90, 91 Isiac Ceremonies
Wall-paintings from Pompeii, c. first century AD. Naples, National Museum.

The participation of the laity in religious services was largely restricted to the outside of temples, Egyptian and Greek alike. It was partly the climate that encouraged this, but it served also to emphasize the division between exoteric and esoteric rites. Moreover, the actual building was conceived of as an architectural incarnation of the god, so was itself an object worthy of reverence. Residues of this survive in the medieval cathedral, which is constructed as an image of the Divine Man, and in which a screen separated the laity in the nave from the collegiate members in the chancel and sanctuary. These scenes of sacrifice both take place before the temple steps. In the first, a mixed choir is ranged on either side (just as in a cathedral), and the priest descends towards the altar with an offering. Isis' sacrifices, like Christ's, never involved the taking of animal life: milk, honey or herbs were the chosen elements. The second scene shows the temple doors acting as the proscenium arch for a sacred dance or drama. Both have Egyptian décor, including imported ibises, the birds of Thoth who, legend tells, would die of grief if transported from their native soil.

Another legend attributes to this bird the habit of giving itself an enema with its long beak, which is why it symbolizes medicine and the healing arts in general. The ceremonies are accompanied musically by players of the double aulos, which would sound rather like a bagpipe, and the tinkling of sistrums. Perhaps a large congregation should be imagined in the spectator's position.

93 Female Sphinx with Victim
Funerary monument, first century A.D.
Colchester and Essex Museum.

There are two kinds of sphinxes. This is the later species, of which a specimen terrorized Thebes until vanquished by Oedipus: she is Greek, feminine and deadly. Her close relations are the Sirens, bird-bodied women who also lure men to their doom and gloat over their remains. They belong to the company of semi-human creatures which may be looked on as elementals, as early states of the human race, or as personifications of psychic contents.

< 92 Temple Ritual by the Nile Part of the Barberini Mosaic, from the Temple of Fortuna in Palestrina, first century B.C. Rome, National Museum.

Egyptian temple rituals were carried out uninterruptedly for at least four thousand years. While changes did occur from time to time, it seems that the basic practices, like the use of hieroglyphs and the architectural and sculptural techniques, were already well established at what we call the beginning of Egyptian civilization, i.e. in pre-dynastic times. No period of slow development has been identified by archaeologists, who are thus faced with the awkward question of how a civilization in its infancy managed to build monuments such as those at Gizeh and Saqqara. In fact Egyptian religion was an inheritance from a previous cycle of civilization, in which the magical qualities of images and music (depicted in use here) were more readily perceived and more generally understood.

94 Royal Sphinx and Bes
Votive stele. First century A.D. or later.
Munich, Glyptothek.

The more ancient Egyptian sphinx is bearded and crowned, and symbolizes the completed state of the human being. He has a man's head, a lion's body, eagle's wings and a serpent for a tail, thus combining four elements, four species and four symbolic functions. On his forehead is the winged disc of the Sun (also seen separately at the top), showing his connection to the source of light, life and inner illumination. The gnome-like figure of Bes seems out of place among the svelte bodies of most Egyptian gods. His origin is Nubian and his appeal popular: he is a god of sorcery and good luck, like a genie of the Arabian Nights. He seems to have been a favourite motif for amulets, invoked to help in childbirth and against evil spirits, and his oracle at Abydos flourished until the fourth century A.D. when it was suppressed by Constantine II.

95 The 'Tazza Farnese'

Sardonyx cameo, Alexandrian, c. 175 B.C.
Naples, National Museum.

There have been many attempts to explain the imagery of this famous gem, and no doubt all of them, and more, are applicable. Its surface reference is to the myth of Osiris, whose death caused the Nile to flood and thus to fertilize the land of Egypt. The Sphinx represents the dead god-king, on whose back sits Isis. The younger man above her is Horus, holding a plough-handle, and the older, seated one with the cornucopia is Father Nile himself. Attendant spirits of Winds and Seasons preside over this vegetation allegory. But in the political context of its time, Osiris represents the deified Pharaoh Ptolemy V Epiphanes (to whom the Rosetta Stone was dedicated) who died in 181 B.C., and his son Ptolemy VI Philometor who ruled under his mother's regency. The image is propaganda for the young king, shown as saviour of his country.

An astronomical meaning, moreover, is suggested by Merkelbach, who notices that the personages are grouped like the constellations associated with the Nile flood. Horus is Orion, Isis Sirius, the two flying Winds Gemini, the nymphs are the Hyades and Pleiades, whose setting signifies the time for ploughing and who rise again at harvest time. The seated figure is Serapis representing (as a solar god) Leo, the sign which the Sun enters at flood-time. The sphinx is the river itself, which begins to rise on 19 July when Sirius first appears.

96 Portrait of the Deceased with Anubis and Osiris

Painted cloth shroud, c. AD 175–200.
Moscow, Pushkin Museum.

On the left of this sensitive young man is the effigy of the mummified Osiris, holding the royal crook and flail, to whom he will be assimilated when Anubis has done his work. The jackal god leads him with a kindly gesture, as he prepares to usher his soul into the presence of the Judge of the Dead. There he will read from the scroll he holds in his hands the story of his life, and make his statement of justification as he has learnt it from the Book of the Dead. The Egyptians, like the Tibetans, were expert in posthumous matters and procedures, though the extensive practice of mummification in later dynastic times denotes a lack of understanding of its true purpose, which was to prevent the transmigration of highly-evolved souls so that their conscious influence might continue on earth.

XII Dionysus

The cult of Dionysus had its origins in Thrace, and its temples throughout classical Greece. When the other Greek gods were adapted by the Romans, Dionysus changed his name (to Bacchus) but not his nature. His cult spread with the Empire all round the Mediterranean, and his Mysteries rivalled in prestige those of Demeter at Eleusis. But while the Eleusinian Mysteries were initiations through 'beholding' (epopteia), Dionysus' were initiations through action.

Of all the Mystery gods, it is Dionysus whose character has become most firmly fixed in the collective imagination. His worship spells orgies and drunkenness; he personifies the irrational and uncontrollable urges of man and beast; he drives to frenzy the maenads and the poets. His is the dynamic energy which can so easily unmake what his brother Apollo has constructed with such loving care – and the relationship between them, the systole and diastole of cyclic manifestation, is what makes the worlds go round. Modern scholars, devotees by profession of Apollo, tend to blame the excesses of Dionysus' cult on wine, opium, ivy- or toadstool-eating, or on some primitive state of mystic participation which, thankfully, it is impossible for them to recapture. But all their efforts to understand him are vain, for he is innately hostile to rational thought. He cannot be understood, only appreciated; and the late C. Kerényi, with his psychological insight and imagination, knew best how to do this while keeping within the bounds of scholarship. Kerényi subtitled his book on Dionysus 'Archetypal Image of Indestructible Life', finding that the Dionysian cult, from its origins in the depths of archaic Greek culture, furnished intimate contact with the very wellsprings of zoë, life, and its counterpart, death.

The myth of Dionysus' origins tells that he was born first from the union of Zeus with Persephone. Zeus designated this Dionysus 'Zagreus' as his heir, but the jealous Titans lured him away while yet a child, dismembered him and devoured all the pieces except for the heart, which Athena rescued and preserved. Zeus in anger reduced the Titans to ashes, from which the new race of mankind was fashioned. Thus each man contains a fragment of Dionysus within his 'titanic' earthly body. From the heart of the god was brewed a love-potion given to Semele, a mortal, who forced her lover – Zeus again – into revealing himself to her in his primal form. The epiphany was so overwhelming as to annihilate her, but the child she was carrying was saved. Zeus enclosed it in his loins until the time came for its birth as the second Dionysus. The young god grew up in Thrace, suckled by goats and raised by satyrs and sileni. When he reached maturity he descended through the Alecyonian Lake to rescue the shade of his mother Semele from Hades and raise her to Olympus; then, accompanied by a motley train of semi-human beings, maenads and panthers, he set off on wanderings throughout the world, from Libya to Arabia and India and back to his homeland. Everywhere he went he brought men knowledge of agriculture, arts and crafts, and especially of the vine and wine-making. On the isle of Naxos he discovered the Cretan princess Ariadne, abandoned there by Theseus, and made her his bride. Together they ascended to the heavens, whence he offers a similar blissful reward to his devotees, temporarily in this life and permanently after death.

If we follow – as I prefer – the Neoplatonists rather than the ethnographers in their interpretation of mythological personages, we find that they equate Dionysus with the 'mundane intellect', the Mind of this world. As son and heir of the cosmic creator Zeus, Dionysus is also a creative deity, but creative through thought, as it were. He produces the idea of the world, and his knowledge sustains it in all its reality. At the same time he is dismembered by the Titans, who are the direct creators of physical matter, and distributed into the human race, i.e. he is also the higher mind of each one of us. This higher intellect is a supernatural faculty of simultaneous creation, perception and understanding, through which man can gain supersensible knowledge. In the body it finds its reflection in the pineal gland (the 'third eye'), which cone-like organ atop the spinal column is represented by the thyrsus, that mysterious Bacchic wand made from a pine-cone fixed to a fennel stalk (see plates). The purpose of Bacchic initiation is presumably to awaken this faculty, and to make man aware of the great mind of which his intellect is a part. This is symbolized by the rebirth of Dionysus from an earthly mother, from which follow all the benefits which insight and creative inspiration have brought to mankind.

The connection of this metaphysical Dionysus with the notorious behaviour of his followers is not immediately apparent. Kerényi discusses only the phallic and sacrificial Dionysian rites of the earlier period, readily explained by his Indestructible Life theory. The Neoplatonists and their successors only consider the lofty, theological aspects. Evidently Dionysian religion embraced both extremes, just as Christianity includes Holy Rollers and Trappist monks. There were Bacchantes, no doubt, who, commemorating the act of the Titans, tore to pieces living creatures and devoured them raw. Doubtless there were some Dionysian initiations, specifically those of children, which revealed the 'facts of life' on a sexual level; while others, at the touch of the thyrsus, opened the window of the supersensible world. Perhaps the act of omophagy (eating raw flesh), under conditions of ritual intoxication, afforded a spiritual experience: we do not know, we who have not tried it. What is certain is that one insists at one's peril on fitting the Dionysian phenomena into a single, unifying theory of religious experience, substituting a tidy intellectual construct for a reality as vivid, as varied, and as unruly as the world itself.

97 Dionysus and Pan

Tapestry fragment from Egypt, fourth century A.D. Boston, Museum of Fine Arts.

Although Dionysus himself is very rarely shown as ithyphallic, his association with Pan and the lustful retinue over which he presides show that he is a god of virility, fertility and the regenerative powers of sex. Pan carries here the pedom (shepherd's crook) and a fawn-skin, Dionysus a garland (cf. Pl. 100), while in the background are castanets, Pan-pipes and the kantharos drinking vessel, all Dionysian symbols. Both wear the haloes that denote divinity. Such crudely 'post-classical' works as the ones shown in this section bear witness to the survival of Dionysus' cult all around the Mediterranean well into the Christian era. But whether the persisting Dionysian iconography was supported by a continuation of his Mysteries is another question: they were probably limited to the great centres of urban civilization where his cult flourished most strongly, such as Alexandria, Athens, Pergamum and Ephesus.

98 The Divine Child

Ivory pyxis, fifth century A.D. Bologna, Museo Civico Archeologico.

The young Dionysus squats confidently on a throne, looking at himself in a mirror, while two armed Corybantes, who should be defending the infant god, prepare to kill and dismember him. Dionysus' fascination by a looking-glass, followed by his temporary death, represents the fate of the human soul which, according to Platonic doctrine, looks down from its home in the heavens and sees its reflection in the deceptive surface of the material world. Allured like Narcissus by the beauty of its own image, it tries to grasp or follow the evanescent vision, and in the effort tumbles down into the miry toils of a life that is death to the soul.

99 The Lycurgus Cup

Glass from Alexandria (?), c. AD 330–50.
London, British Museum.

With a craftsmanship verging on the miraculous, the artist has carved on this cup the tale of Dionysus' punishment of Lycurgus, a Thracian king who molested the followers of the god. On the reverse Lycurgus is shown blinded and entangled in the tendrils of a vine, while a faun and satyr prepare to kill him at their master's command. Why would such extraordinary care have been lavished on this subject? It is rare for Dionysus to be shown aggressive or angry, and I can only conclude that the cup was made, probably with magical as well as decorative intent, in response to a persecution of Dionysians and other pagans by Christian fanatics, such as occurred frequently in the Eastern Mediterranean after Constantine's conversion.

100 Dionysus with the Seasons

Sarcophagus, early third century AD. Kassel, Landgrafenmuseum.

The god, riding a panther, is here flanked by the four Seasons (cf. Pl. 9) and by putti and fauns engaged in Dionysian activities. He is a god of the cycles of the earth, though historically this was expressed in an unusual way. One year his death was commemorated, the next year his resurrection, in a two-year cycle of Dionysian festivals. No reference to this is to be seen in the Kassel sarcophagus, one of the suavest products of its period which invokes rather the late antique idea of the Seasons as symbols of cosmic cycles, and of the various saviour gods (including Dionysus) as lords over them. The idea of periodic death and rebirth is the predominant meaning behind such an icon.

101 Dionysus in India

Sarcophagus, early third century AD. Kassel, Landgrafenmuseum.

The two forms of the god are both shown on this and several other sarcophagi in the 'Dionysian baroque' style. On the left is the young god of the upper world, endowed with the features of Alexander the Great – another voyager to India and, so he claimed, another son of Zeus by an earthly mother. The serious elderly figure in the centre is the god after his death going down to the underworld: his placing suggests an identification with the deceased. According to Kerényi, the consecrated person or animal representing Dionysus was dismembered and eaten raw in a Mystery commemorating the death of Dionysus Zagreus and also affording (like the Christian Mass) a communion for his worshippers. The phallus alone was preserved and it, or a wooden replica, was placed in the liknon (see Pl. 106) to represent the life-principle which would be reborn the following year in the young Dionysus, the 'light from the East'.

102 Dionysus finds Ariadne
Mosaic from Merida, fifth or sixth century
AD. Merida, Museo Arqueológico.

Ariadne was abandoned by her lover Theseus on the island of Naxos where Dionysus found her, fell in love, and married her. In southern Spain, at the very close of antiquity, a local artist, 'Anniponus', was still using this subject: Ariadne sleeping, a faun, a figure with pedum and panther-skin, the god with toga, hunting boots and kantharos. Did he know the meaning, on any level, of what he was depicting? Perhaps in his demesne Dionysus had the status of a cargo-cult: a numinous reminiscence of something incomprehensible and obviously very sacred, rather like the indigenous British carvings of Roman and Oriental deities.

103 Triumph of Dionysus and Ariadne
Mosaic from Hadrumetum, early third century AD. Tunisia, Sousse Museum.

The triumphal procession of a god with attendant spirits always signifies a passage through the states of existence, which is naturally of most import in so far as it concerns the fate of man. The soul is Ariadne, the sleeping beauty abandoned by her human lover Theseus (the physical body) and swept off her feet by love of a god. Borne on Dionysus' tiger-drawn quadriga, she ascends with him to the sound of maenadic music – the music of the spheres – to her own proper realm, and his. The Tunisian artist, unlike the one in Merida (Pl. 102), was evidently copying from a classical model.

104 The Old Dionysus visits a Mortal
Graeco-Roman copy of an Alexandrian relief of the third century BC. London,
British Museum.

Ptolemy IV Philopator (c. 244–205 BC) was a devotee of Dionysus and took the organization of the cult in hand, actually requiring all initiators to come to Alexandria and register. In this relief, probably dating from Ptolemy's time, the old Dionysus, master of the underworld, is figured, contrasting strongly in his sobria ebrietas and his tipsy contingent with the wide-awake welcoming gesture of his host. We can tell from the box of masks beside the couch that the latter is a poet or dramatist, and of course he is not in bed but at table. He is inviting Dionysus to a feast: the sacred banquet of artistic production and enjoyment. Well may he, awake to the ordinary world, invoke the god of subconscious inspiration whose altar stood in every Greek theatre and who ruled both the consummate art of tragedy and the lewd satyr plays, the dramatizations of heroic death and of tumescent life.

105 Dionysian Cult Objects

Wall-painting from Pompeii, first century A.D. Naples, National Museum.

Most of the attributes of Dionysus are included here. At the top are a tambourine and a kantharos flanking a liknon, the wicker winnowing-basket in which the baby Dionysus was cradled, and which here contains another cup, a garlanded thyrsus, and a drinking horn draped with a panther-skin. On the steps are a sprig of bay, a pair of cymbals, and a miniature panther grappling with a snake. It would probably be a mistake to read too deep a meaning into this arrangement, but the contents of the liknon are interesting. Normally it is veiled; when unveiled it may contain fruits, a mask of Dionysus or a phallus, to the last of which the horn obviously alludes.

106 The Liknon unveiled

Terracotta relief, c. first century A.D.
Hanover, Kestner Museum.

In this rare picture of an uncovered liknon, the basket is seen to contain the attributes of Priapus, an upright phallus placed among fruits, symbolizing the inexhaustible forces of life and fertility. Always in Dionysian initiation scenes, it is women who act as the leaders and initiators: the women (cf. Pl. 107) have control of the veiled men or boys who are evidently the neophytes. The liknon is brought by a silenus, i.e. by a non-human personage who stands outside the drama. In what, then, consists the initiation? What is depicted here can only be a superficial part of the great Dionysian secret. The initiation must have been primarily a matter of the state of mind, and only secondarily one of content. The same ceremony, or symbols, witnessed in a state of religious or other intoxication, might have had a very different meaning and afforded a new intensity of experience, unsuspected by a mere beholder of the scene.

107 Initiation Scene

Stucco relief from the Farnesina, 30-25 B.C.
Rome, National Museum.

As in Pl. 106, a woman leads a veiled male while a silenus attends to the liknon: here he is in the act of covering it. Kerényi says that in male initiations the liknon with its contents were put on the head of the man or boy, who thereby became a living symbol of the male principle. It may be that this individual was not actually initiated himself, but, like the boy in the Pompeian Villa of the Mysteries mural, merely acted a part for the benefit of a feminine ceremony. He is veiled so as not to see what the women actually do.

108 Dionysian Revelry

The silver 'Oceanus Dish' from the Mildenhall Treasure, c. AD 350–75. London, British Museum.

The outermost circle resounds with the music of aulos and Pan-pipes, tambourines and cymbals, as four lithe maenads dance with Pan and his satyrs. Hercules is dead drunk, his great bulk supported with difficulty by two young attendants. Dionysus alone is still, approached by his consort, the more staidly moving Ariadne, and served wine by a silenus. This is the world of the blessed. The inner ring contains again four 'couples', nymphs riding sea-monsters. They are souls in transition, crossing the 'ocean' which separates this world from the next, and whose personification as Oceanus (cf. Pl. 7) occupies the centre.

109 Dancing Maenads

Roman funerary altar, mid-first century AD. Rome, National Museum.

Two possible climaxes to a woman's initiation were the sacred marriage with the god, in which she identified with Ariadne, and the ecstatic dance in which she became a maenad. Music and movement, sexuality and intoxication, all are implied in the depictions of maenads, and from them the Dionysia have earned the reputation they have today. But when the dance appears on a tombstone, it has nothing to do with crude revelry: it has the same meaning as the dance of the blessed souls with the angels in the Christian paradise.

XIII Orpheus and Hercules

There might seem at first to be little in common between the gentle Thracian bard and the Argive strong-man. But unlike the subjects of the preceding chapters, Orpheus and Hercules were not gods, but mortal heroes who were elevated to Olympus after their deaths. Both were carried to Rome, moreover, on the same wave of Pythagorean enthusiasm that swept northwards from Magna Graecia at the end of the fourth century B.C. At this period a statue of Pythagoras himself was erected at one end of the Comitium, and the cult of the Greek Heracles was permitted to enter the city. As the first foreign cult to do so, Hercules' had not a temple but an altar as its centre, the Ara Maxima. The Pythagoreans revered both heroes as having been inspired by Apollo, if indeed they were not actual incarnations of the Sun God. Hercules was also a focus of aspiration for the Stoics, who admired him alongside Ulysses as an exemplar of heroic virtue and constancy. The common people invoked him as an averter of evil and remover of obstacles, while several emperors encouraged his cult, with its stress on military virtues as an alternative to other licentious or over-mystical religions. Some of them identified themselves with him (see Commodus, p. 10), and the Emperor Julian hoped that Hercules might serve as a replacement for Christ.

Orpheus' was a more esoteric following. He seems to have lived in Thrace in post-Homeric but pre-classical times, and to have been a reformer of, and within, the cult of Dionysus. Like Christ in Judaism and Buddha in Hinduism, he was rejected by followers of the old faith but succeeded in founding a new one alongside it. Orphism is an ascetic and speculative Dionysianism, aiming at the same goal of release from earthly conditions but pursuing it in a more conscious, controlled and intellectual way. Pythagoras' own school is the perfect example of Orphic attitudes, and coeval with the first evidence of Orphic activities in Athens and southern Italy. With the Neopythagorean revival of the last centuries B.C. came the establishment of a literary canon (the Orphic Hymns), an elaborate theogony and cosmogony, and Mysteries among whose initiates were Plutarch and, some say, the young Saul of Tarsus. The ascetic teachings of the Orphics, so very foreign to the Greek mentality, were perfectly at one with early Christian ethics, and the figure of Orpheus was borrowed in Christian iconography for representations of David and even of Christ himself. Certainly the two religions seem to have coalesced in certain circles (see Pl. 110).

Orpheus, Hercules and Jesus: all three were born as demi-gods, performed miracles, and descended to the underworld before or after suffering cruel deaths. They were afterwards raised to Heaven by their divine fathers, whence they still radiate beneficent influences to their worshippers. Which of them one would have chosen in the early centuries AD would depend on one's own inner orientation. The Orphic life of asceticism and intellectual learning would appeal to those on the Path of Knowledge, and they would understand best the doctrines of reincarnation and eventual liberation from the Circle of Necessity through one's own efforts. Christ, on the other hand, is the perfect exemplar of the Path of Divine Love, and Hercules of the Path of the Warrior, the way of selfless activity and ceaseless labours in the cause of the good.

110 Orphic Signet-ring

Gold ring, fifth century AD. London, British Museum.

The Greek inscription around the edge of the bezel reads ΤΟ ΣΦΡΑΓΙΣ Ο ΟΑΝΟΥ ΤΟΥ ΑΓΘΟΥ ΦΘΑΝΗ – probably to be translated as 'The Seal of John, the Pre-eminent Saint'. In the centre Orpheus is seated, playing the lyre, while a serpent curls round a tree and two indeterminate beasts lie at his feet. The actual meaning and provenance of the ring are a mystery, but it seems to assimilate Orpheus with St John the Divine. Whatever his ancient nature, 'Orpheus' was acknowledged by late pagans as the theologian par excellence; and certainly the theology of St John, of all the Christian canon, is most readily reconciled with the highest pagan doctrines. The seal probably comes from syncretistic Christian circles in which Orpheus was recognized as the pre-eminent 'saint' of the pagan world.

111 Orpheus with Seven-stringed Lyre
Mosaic from Vienne. Vienne, Lapidarium
St-Pierre.

Orpheus plays the same instrument as his father Apollo, symbolizing the music of the seven planets and the universal laws of septenary manifestation whose knowledge gives magical power over all created things. Orpheus could charm beasts, plants and even the denizens of the Underworld, i.e. he understood the laws of sympathy and harmony that link every level of creation, and was able to put them to use. Whether this is done through actual music or through alchemy, astrology or magic makes little difference, these being man-made categories that, like the various religions, divide an essential unity in order to accommodate the differences within the human race.

112 Orpheus charming the Beasts
Ivory pyxis, fourth century AD. Bobbio, San Colombano.

The creatures are the same as take part in the processions of Dionysus: faun, centaur, lion, goat, etc. (see Pl. 101). But in contrast to the noise and revelry of the Bacchic rout, around Orpheus all is stillness and silence save his music. Just so, the historical Orpheus tamed the rites of Dionysus, rejecting the cruel and undisciplined elements and imposing – perhaps for the first time in the Western world – a lofty ethic of purity and non-injury. The Orphics and Pythagoreans were truly the first Christians in the ethical sense, and a few Christians like St Francis have extended their compassion in Pythagorean fashion to the animal kingdom.

113 Herculean Initiate

Marble funerary statue from Massicault, later third century A.D. Tunis, Bardo National Museum.

Clad in the Nemean lionskin and grasping a bunch of poppies, the initiate takes on the guise of Hercules at the end of his career, after his initiation into the Eleusinian Mysteries. The finely-drawn portrait of a serious older man contrasts strangely with the ill-proportioned body, but there is something touching about his markedly un-Herculean physique. From his face he seems a far more plausible candidate for mystical initiations than a crude muscle-man such as the famous Farnese Hercules. The poppies suggest that the Eleusinian Mysteries, like those of Dionysus, may have involved the use of drugs. But we cannot assume that they had the same effect on the ancients as they do today, for the psyche of man and his relationship to the unseen worlds have definitely altered since those times.

114 The Labours of Hercules
Sarcophagus, c. AD 150. Velletri, Museo Civico.

Hercules' first four labours all entailed slaying troublesome beasts: the Nemean Lion, whose pelt he wore for ever after; the Lernaean Hydra; the Erymanthian Boar; and the Stymphalian Birds. The next four involved live animals: the capture of the Ceryneian Hind; the cleaning of the Augean Stables (for which Hercules should have received a tithe of Augeas' herd); the capture of the Cretan Bull and of the Mares of Diomedes. His last four adventures were to capture the Girdle of Hippolyte, the Cattle of Geryon, the Golden Apples of the Hesperides, and Cerberus, the guard-dog of the Underworld. In occult circles these labours are said to symbolize the twelve trials through which the soul of Everyman must pass before it is released from the bonds of earthly existence and the need for further incarnations. On a sarcophagus they imply the identification of the deceased with the hero, and express a hope that his life and labours will also end with assimilation to the gods,

115 Apotheosis of Hercules

Tower-tomb of the Secundini, c. AD 245.
Igel, near Trier.

Hercules' last adventure trapped him into donning the blood-soaked shirt of the centaur Nessus, whom he had killed. As soon as he wore it a terrible burning seized him, but he could not get it off. Tearing up pine-trees in his agony, he built with them a funeral pyre, and as the flames reached his body he was snatched up to heaven by his father Zeus. Here he ascends in a chariot, to be received by his patroness Athena, in the apotheosis which awaits all heroes at the end of their trials on earth.

XIV The Overseers

The wise pagan Celsus thought it probable that from the beginning the different parts of the earth had been allotted to different overseers, and that it was thus entirely proper for men to worship their own local gods and goddesses. Being a Platonic philosopher, Celsus did not confuse these lesser gods, daemons, angels, folk-souls (call them what you will) with the Supreme God. But local pride and provincialism tended to blur the distinction in the minds of many. It is inevitable among unphilosophical people, and in general there is no harm done by identifying one's overseer with the Absolute, any more than in treating one's family as if they were the most important people in the world. In this section we pass in review some ten of these beings. Most of them are quite a mystery to modern researchers, since there are no records of their doctrines and rituals. Fragmentary inscriptions and occasional mentions in literature are all we have to supplement the iconography and architectural remains in which they appear in all their glory.

Roman Syria stretched from the Taurus Mountains to the Euphrates, and every region had its own local pantheon whose head was the Lord of Heaven. These are the 'gods of the heathen' of the Old Testament, and their nature is well illustrated in I Kings 18 where Elijah and the prophets of Baal compete for a celestial thunderbolt to kindle their offerings: they are at once supercosmic powers and telluric weather gods. Hence their eagles and thunderbolts, symbols of unsurpassable heights and irresistible magical power. When the Romans annexed Syria in 64 B.C. they encouraged the inhabitants to equate their various overseers with Jupiter: the Jupiter Optimus Maximus or even the Jupiter Exsuperantissimus around whom all the other Roman deities were tending to revolve. For the Romans such assimilation was an easy matter, but in fact there was much variety in the Syrian religion, and many vestiges of a more primordial cult which they overlooked in their synthesizing enthusiasm. Some of the gods reacted by imposing their religions on their conquerors, in cults that stretched from one end of the Empire to the other.

One such was the god of Dolichenus (Pls 116–119), who had his territory in Commagene, a small area now in southern Turkey which the Romans added to Syria in AD 72. From these obscure beginnings his influence spread along the Danube and the Rhine, through the Netherlands and up to Hadrian's Wall. Syria was the most fertile source of slaves and soldiers in an expanding economy that felt an increasing need for both, and these were probably the first to propagate his cult. But as provincials were promoted and given citizenship, so also Dolichenus climbed the social ladder, gaining adherents among senators and knights and reaching his apogee in the time of the Severi around AD 200. In contrast to the dedications by individuals to Mithras, the other favourite god of the legionaries, Dolichenus received votive dedications from entire units, suggesting that his was a more open and exoteric cult, probably without any profound initiatic content although its symbols are deeply rooted in Aryan tradition.

The overseers of the Syrian tribes all bore the name Bel or Baal, and like Dolichenus fulfilled both the position of a supreme deity above the cosmos – Baal Shamin, 'Lord of Heaven' – and that of an approachable and personal father and weather god. Many inscriptions in Palmyra address Baal, like his successor Allah, as 'the Compassionate and Merciful', and record gratitude 'because the God listened to the prayer'. But there was also in Syria and throughout the ancient Near East a cult of non-anthropomorphic symbols of the overseers: a cult of stones and mountain-tops, of totems and star-lore. High places are always associated with the Sky God: they encourage observation of the stars and planets, and afford contact with elemental forces; in them one feels elevated above the human condition, unprotected but also unenumbered by the everyday life of the valleys beneath. They are peculiarly the haunts of local overseers and have always been recognised as holy. Sacred stones also come from the sky. Meteorites, regarded as actual thunderbolts, are gifts from the Lord of Heaven, and just as the local Baals are in a sense lesser reflections of him, so the meteorite is a fragment of heaven and is revered as such. Examples which have affected more than local history are the Ka'ba Stone at Mecca; the meteoric image of Cybele at Pessinus; and the Betyl of Emesa (modern Homs) which the Emperor Elagabalus brought in triumph to Rome in his attempt to force the entire Empire into obeisance before the local Baal of which he happened to be high priest (see Pl. 35).

All the Baals have female consorts, at least in theory: they are not often shown as a reigning pair. These are the saktis of the gods in Hindu theology, meaning the 'power with which a god, otherwise self-contained, 'procreates' and thus creates and influences lower levels of being. Baal Hadad of Hierapolis (now Membij) in north Syria had a notable consort in Atargatis, known to the Greeks and Romans simply as the 'Syrian Goddess'. Lucian has left a vivid account of her festivals, which included the raising of gigantic phalli, people swimming out to deck an altar in the middle of a sacred lake, the sacrifice of animals, and self-mutilation. It was just such religious enthusiasms that St Paul found so repulsive at Ephesus, where the Ephesian Artemis had one of the most magnificent Ionic temples of the ancient world. Here and in other centres of Asia Minor – Aphrodisias, Samos, Sardis, Pergamum – the inhabitants seem to have favoured goddesses, who presided over their development in Hellenistic and Roman times until their cities became bywords for elegance and luxury.

Sometimes the Great Goddess has as her consort not a mature Zeus-type but a younger man, perhaps her son. Cybele and Attis are the best-known example; in Anatolia and Phrygia there was also Men, a moon god, who had important centres near modern Antalya at which it appears that the Mysteries involved a sacred marriage ceremony. There is a tradition, probably the oldest one of all, that the moon is not female but male and that it is the Man in the Moon, not the husband, who really impregnates women – for in primitive societies sexual intercourse is not necessarily connected causally with pregnancy. A modern resurgence of this belief is the method of birth-control by considering the relation of the phase of the moon to the woman's natal horoscope: conception is most likely when the sun and moon are in the same relationship as at her birth. So old superstitions are modernized and reborn, and so the celebration of the hierogamy of Men and the Great Mother Goddess may have had a practical as well as a ritual purpose.

Sabazius, originating in Thrace (now Bulgaria), is another local overseer of whom very little is known nowadays. As with Men and so many others, his remains are from later epochs – Hellenistic and later – by which time he had undergone assimilation and no doubt distortion. The Greeks equated him with Dionysus, the Romans at first with Bacchus then, in the increasingly syncretistic atmosphere of the Empire period, with the same cosmocratic Jupiter as had swallowed up the individual Baals. Sabazius' symbols are the snake and the pine-cone, and this is enough to indicate that he was an initiatic god and not merely a tribal totem. They symbolize the Kundalini and the Third Eye, with which the true Mysteries concern themselves. According to Clement of Alexandria, the Sabazian Mysteries involved drawing a live serpent across the breast of the initiate in imitation, he says, of the 'God who penetrates the bosom'. Here is a clear example of a ritual action, seemingly bizarre, paralleling an interior experience in the heart-centre: 'an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace'.

116 Standard of Dolichenus

Bronze standard from Mauer, second century A.D. Vienna, Kunsthistorisches Museum.

Several triangular standards, no two alike, show Jupiter Dolichenus with his consort Juno Dolichena. Many of them seem rather confused in imagery, but this one is quite plain in its arrangement of the pair on four different levels of being. At the apex is the Dolichene triad of eagle, sun and moon, i.e. the hypercosmic principle which is Jupiter in his highest manifestation, above the symbols of the opposites in the cosmos. Next are Jupiter and Juno in their respective bull- and stag-drawn chariots, symbols of the dynamic action of solar and lunar, or of positive and negative, influences. Below these the pair perform a sacrifice: the perpetual transmutation of matter and energy that sustains the world. At the bottom they both stand on bulls, flanked by army standards and facing a statue of Victory, representing their personal function as givers of good fortune and success.

117 Jupiter Dolichenus on his Bull
Bronze statuette. Vienna, Kunsthistorisches
Museum.

The Dolichene supreme god wears a military cuirass not so much because he is a war god as because this was the usual ceremonial garb of emperors on earth. His weapon, the double-headed axe, is one of the most venerable symbolic arms, found wherever the Aryan race has spread, from Tibet to Scandinavia. It refers to the duality of constructive and destructive forces (both of which an axe can serve) that govern the manifested world. Then it is equivalent to the thunderbolt (resembling in shape the Indian vajra or Tibetan dorje) which is peculiarly the attribute of cosmic or sky gods. Ancient people recognized the lightning-stroke as a life-bringing force, and modern scientists have expressed the same idea in their fantasies about the origins of organic compounds from the action of lightning on some primeval molecular 'broth'. Finally the ceremonial axe is traditionally of stone (e.g. the Cretan labrys) and hence an incarnation – or rather a petrification – of a spiritual principle. Dolichenus' beasts are the eagle and the bull, the former associated with Jupiter as hypercosmic principle, the latter with the sign of Taurus. This places his origins far anterior to any of his monuments, among the other cosmocrators of the Taurean Age (fourth-third millennia B.C.), such as Varuna and the Cretan Zeus.

< 118 Plaque of Dolichenus

Silver plaque with traces of gilding, from Hedderheim, second-third century A.D. London, British Museum.

The inscription dedicates this finely-beaten plaque to 'I[upiter] O[ptimus] M[aximus] Dolicheno ubi ferrum nascitur' – 'where the iron is born' – referring to the iron mines of Doliche. Its shape suggests the Sky God's thunderbolt. Several other tablets showing a god in identical stance and surroundings have been found in England, but dedicated to Mars, who is even more closely associated with iron, since his planet rules the metal and the weapons made of it. The virtue of the god is inherent in the metal, and in response to the soldier's offering will aid its user.

119 Dolichenus and Egyptian Divinities

Relief from the Dolichene shrine on the Aventine, second century A.D. Rome, Capitoline Museum.

The main elements here are the traditional Dolichene symbols: Jupiter and Juno on bull and hind, the wreathed and flaming altar, the eagle with a thunderbolt. At the corners are the two Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux, whose origins lie in ancient Roman religion but who often attend Dolichenus. More surprising are the busts, in the centre, of Serapis and Isis. Theirs is the place of honour, perhaps in acknowledgment of them as superior manifestations of the male and female powers, like Sol and Luna in Pl. 116.

120 A Palmyrene Trinity

Niche lintel from the sanctuary of Baal Shamin, first century A.D. Syria, Palmyra Museum.

Baal Shamin, Lord of Heaven, is represented by an eagle, overshadowing his two cohorts Aglibol and Malakbel, the moon and sun gods. They each have their own eagles, indicating cosmic powers similar in kind to Baal Shamin's, but inferior in degree. Little is known of Palmyrene religion, except the propitiatory parts of it: sacrifices and thank-offerings. But it included sacred banquets of a eucharistic kind at which wine was drunk, always a symbol of hidden Mysteries; and inside the richly decorated tombs not only are the deceased shown feasting, but communion meals were celebrated by the living.

121 Malakbel in Griffin Chariot

Altar from Palmyra. Rome, Capitoline Museum.

Malakbel is the Palmyrene Sun God, carried heavenwards here by the archetypal solar animals, half-lion, half-eagle. The sun that we see in the sky is merely the wheel of the solar chariot, revolving as it climbs up to the zenith at noon, then plunging at sunset into the desert or the sea. The solar orb is propelled by invisible forces, represented by these four mythical creatures, who provide its motive power much as the four great Archangels oversee this earth and keep it on its course. But directing these powers is a single being, the Soul of the Sun or Solar Logos, and it is he who is represented by the person in the chariot.

122 Zeus-Baal Shamin

Relief from Dura Europos, A.D. 32. Yale University Art Gallery.

This stele is dated and inscribed in Greek 'to Zeus' and in Palmyrene Aramaic 'to Baal Shamin'. It shows Zeus crowned like Serapis with a modius and figuring as a giver of fruits to mankind. The donor offers him a sheep. Dura Europos, now Qalat es Sālihiya on the Syrian Euphrates, is an important source for monuments of several religions (see also Pls 47, 68, 71), but its local lord was Baal Shamin, the universal deity of the Syrian tribes.

123 The 'Boglio Stele'

Limestone relief from Siliana, late third century A.D. Tunis, Bardo National Museum.

Baal Hammon of Carthage was assimilated to the Roman Saturn, named on this funerary stele, and appropriately so for he is the 'grim reaper': the lord of the harvest and the harvester of men. The dedicator Cuttinus and his wife were Punic landowners, and the lower compartments show their activities in life: ploughing, harvesting, and offering their best produce to the gods. Saturn is a beneficent figure, sickle in hand, mounted on a bull like other Baals. The Dioscuri stand on either side, lords of the dawn and twilight and hence guardians of the passage between heaven and earth. Two Victories and an eagle complete the picture: the eagle, perhaps, of Jupiter Exsuperantissimus who reigns even above the realm of his father Kronos, in the timeless state where reaping and winnowing are no more.

124 Atargatis

Statue from the Janiculum, third century AD. Rome, National Museum.

This statue, evidently influenced both by Egyptian art and by the spiralling serpent motif of the Mithraic Aion (see Pls 72, 74), is probably intended to represent the Syrian Goddess, Atargatis of Hierapolis. Her cult had the same appeal for the Romans as the other exotic religions from the East: a ritual aimed at self-forgetfulness and self-abnegation in the face of a consuming divinity. Sacred prostitution was practised at her Syrian centre, though not at Rome, affording communion with the goddess through intercourse with her earthly representative.

125 Artemis of Ephesus

Statue from the Prytaneion, Ephesus, later second century AD. Izmir, Selçuk Museum.

The original 'Diana of the Ephesians' was a wooden statue clothed in gold, which according to Pliny survived through seven successive rebuildings of her fabulous temple. All the detailed representations of her, however, date from a late period – after AD 200 – and show various accretions, canonical or invented. No two are exactly the same. Her invariable attributes are the tight garment that encases her to the ankles, almost like a herm, its panels filled with animal and other symbols, and the very complicated hauberk which blossoms out below breast level into many egg-like protuberances. In this example its decorations include a Zodiac necklace, and on the back of her head there is a crescent moon. Her hands were open, in a welcoming gesture. Whether the curious appendages are in fact meant as breasts, justifying her epithet 'Diana multimamma', or whether they have some other meaning, even the best scholars cannot decide. Are they grapes, eggs or the offerings of her Galli? The overall effect is one of (literally) exuberant life.

126 Aphrodite of Aphrodisias
Statue from Aphrodisias (?). Vienna, Kunsthistorisches Museum.

Obviously a close cousin of the Ephesian Artemis, the goddess of Aphrodisias shows signs of a more contrived decorative schema. Here is nothing grotesque or enigmatic, but standard motifs of the Hellenistic and Roman periods: a crescent, the three Graces, the Sun and Moon, and Aphrodite riding a sea-goat (Capricorn). Sometimes the order varies, and a panel of Erotes is added at the bottom. The meaning is clear: she is a cosmic goddess, like the Baals and Jupiter; she rules the Sun and Moon, and dispenses her gifts via the trinity of Graces; she rules the sea and hence the world of the unconscious, and causes men to love.

127 Artemis-Anahita and Apollo
Stele from Izmir. Leiden, Rijksmuseum.

Anahita was an ancient Persian goddess 'of the fertilizing waters', whose humid influences, pouring down from the heavens, gave fecundity to the earth. In Armenia the daughters of noble families would go to her temples to prostitute themselves before their marriage: a ceremony of dedication which also ensured some genetic mixture. Anahita's cult spread westwards throughout Asia Minor, where she was interpreted now as Cybele, now as Artemis or as Aphrodite. Here her figure is unmistakably that of Ephesian Artemis, and she is paired with her brother Apollo as sun and moon deities. Both are placed in niches, like the sacred betyl-stones of Syria. The combination of niche with pediment is frequently found as a model of the 'House of God', a miniature temple in itself (see Pl. 131).

128 Men

Bronze statuette. Leiden, Rijksmuseum.

Men was the Moon God of Anatolia and Phrygia. He was assimilated to Attis, with whom he shares his Phrygian cap and youthful good looks, but he was originally a greater god: self-created, higher than the sun, ruler of heaven, earth and the underworld. His symbols are the peacock, pomegranate and pine-cone, all referring to death and rebirth: functions with which the moon is closely connected as the first station for the ascending, and the last for the descending, soul.

129 Sabazian Hand

Bronze hand, third-fourth century AD. St Louis, Missouri, City Art Museum.

Many bronze hands of this kind have been found, all in the logos-gesture (see Pl. 56) but varying greatly in the number and nature of the symbols attached to them. A few are altogether bare. Some have a snake or a pine-cone, Sabazius' particular attributes. Others have the figures of other 'Jupiters' – Heliopolitanus and Dolichenus. Several such as this one are crammed with figures, animals and symbolic objects. Their sheer variety deters one from any but the vaguest generalizations as to their meanings, but it seems that they were self-contained objects of a votive nature, expressing like the Sabazian plaque (Pl. 130) the centrality of the god's logos or thought to all creation. In this specimen there is a noticeable and perhaps significant division into three levels: on the wrist, a cavern containing a mother and child (cf. Pl. 138) and supporting an altar; in the centre, the figure of Sabazius himself; on the outstretched fingers, perched on a thunderbolt, the eagle of the cosmocrator with the broken bust (of Ganymede?) on its wing. Perhaps Sabazius is invoked here as a saviour god, mediating between the dark cavern of generation and the empyrean heights.

130 Sabazius

Bronze relief found in Rome, first century AD. Copenhagen, National Museum.

The assortment of objects and creatures surrounding the Phrygian-capped Sabazius includes recognized divinities: the Dioscuri, Helios in a quadriga, the Sun and Moon; symbolic animals: fly, mouse, bull, tortoise, bee, locust, frog, eagle on pillar, serpent, lizard; objects: scales, ox haunch, two crossed auloi, winged lightning, yoke, several vessels, rosettes, cornucopia, cymbals, ear of barley, plough. The crowding together of so many symbols resembles syncretistic images (see Chapter XV), but few of them have definite connections with particular gods. They are not doctrinal allusions so much as apotropaic and sympathetic invocations, made in a magical frame of mind.

131 Dedication to the Moon God
Stele, possibly from Thessaloniki. Istanbul, Archaeological Museum.

The maker of this stele, like those of the objects in Pls 123, 127 and 130, is following a traditional pattern of universal significance. Fundamentally a combination of a triangle and a square, it is a symbol of the heavens, where the superhuman beings proliferate in triads or trinities, above the earth, where all is compounded of the four elements. In the Boglio and Anahita stelae there is the added refinement of a dome in between the two, representing the vault of the visible heavens and containing the lord of that limited universe. The triangular pediment is above the inerratic circle of the stars, and contains the eagle of hypercosmic Jupiter. This stele fills the middle zone, unusually, with the Moon God, the three Fates, Men and Hercules. The donors, as in the Boglio stele, are firmly on 'earth'. This threefold scheme of the celestial, planetary and elemental worlds is found throughout the Perennial Philosophy, and is a key to many varieties of traditional architecture, beside being reflected in the human body itself.

132 Winged City Goddess
Silver statuette from Macon, France, before
AD 260. London, British Museum.

Cities as well as nations have their fates, personified as tutelary deities to whom the generic name of Tyche (Fate) was given. This figure may be the Tyche of Marsilia – now Marseilles. Just as every human being is a microcosm, so every lesser god or goddess is supreme in his or her own preserve, and contains elements of the archetypal inferior gods. The ruler of a city has seven aspects which correspond to the planets, shown here above her head in order of the days of the week: Saturn, Sun, Moon, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus. Beneath these are the Dioscuri, and at her left hand the twins Apollo and Artemis. With her right hand she pours a libation upon an altar, presumably sacrificing to those greater powers of which she is an image.

XV Syncretism

Every now and then the currents of history force people out of their insularity and compel them to recognize that there are others in the world whose habits and customs differ utterly from their own. This took place on a large scale under the Roman Empire, when innumerable individuals were uprooted through slavery or for military purposes; and again in our own time Westerners, at least, have been driven by inquisitiveness and ambition to explore the whole earth. A broadening of human horizons is the happiest result of such compulsions – of the unhappy results enough has been said by others – and such expansion of consciousness affects most powerfully the ever-sensitive nerve of religion.

Two basic reactions are possible: that of the missionary and that of the syncretist. The missionary, fired by the conviction that his is the only true god, or that his faith is the best one for all men, seeks to impose it upon less favoured folk by example, argument, subterfuge or force. Sometimes he goes so far as to believe himself endowed by evolution – or even entrusted by God – with the right to rule these 'lesser breeds without the law'. But the Romans, for all their faults, did not share the contempt for other races that was so marked among the Athenians and the Jews, for example. They were conquerors, of course, arrogant and greedy for territory; but once a land was subject to them their custom was, increasingly, to grant the free inhabitants Roman citizenship with all its privileges and opportunities. Their attitude to religion was similarly tolerant, though it was admittedly the tolerance of agnosticism and convenience: for religion was a powerful means for the assimilation of other cultures. If you respect a man's gods, you are half-way towards winning his friendship.

Politics rather than philosophy lay behind the early syncretistic attitude, which simply juxtaposed the gods of different cultures or else equated them. The Romans had been doing this from their earliest days as the masters of Italy, admitting first the local overseers of other Italic tribes and then Latinizing in its entirety Greek Olympus. Later the Syrian Baals all became Jupiters, as described in the previous chapter, and provincial pantheons like those of the Celts and Gauls were enriched by the enrolment of suitable Greek or Roman gods.

A second stage of syncretism grew out of an increasing impulse towards monotheism, felt throughout the Empire towards the beginning of the Christian era. Perhaps it surfaced first in the cult of Isis, who was already a universal goddess in her homeland of Egypt. The Egyptians had cultivated solar and other monotheisms for thousands of years, and their conceptions and knowledge of deity far surpassed those of younger nations. The Isiac syncretists would accept a multiplicity of powers in the universe, yet subject them to a One who is their centre, or apex. The personification of the One, in later syncretisms, could be the Sun, or it could be a named god or goddess (see Pls 136 and 138–141), upon whom were bestowed as attributes the symbols of other gods, as many as possible. This implies that the chosen divinity includes all the others as its powers and aspects. It is an acknowledgment of the reality of other gods, but expresses a preference – perhaps merely a personal, not a dogmatic one – for one's own.

Syncretism, while preferable to bigotry and persecution, was never more than a convenience, at a low philosophical level. Rather like the modern democratic attitude which allows everyone's opinion equal weight, it makes no attempt at a real 'discerning of spirits', i.e. at trying to establish the actual nature and function of each god, which, if it can be done, ineluctably places them in a hierarchy. The Neoplatonists used the names of Greek and Roman gods to expound the complexities of their hierarchical scheme of 'Orphic' theology, but the scheme must have existed long before, expressed in symbols of another sort. The beings to which they refer as 'Jupiter', 'Attis', etc., are not necessarily the same as the ones which were commonly worshipped under those names: yet these philosophers alone give us insight into an esoteric theology, without which we would be little better off than the simple syncretists.

133 Cernunnos with Apollo and Mercury
Relief from Rheims, early first century AD.
Rheims, Museum.

The Celtic Cernunnos is a god of the underworld and the dead, and also of healing and wealth, combining worldly and subterranean functions like the Greek Pluto. Acceptance of him contributed greatly to the success of the Romanization of Gaul. The Celtic belief, at least in exoteric circles, was that the dead live in a world beneath the earth: a world of compensation and wish-fulfilment, rather more inviting than the twilit limbo of Hades. Wealth and happiness on earth were a foretaste of these undying pleasures. Cernunnos pours forth a stream of gold coins as he sits cross-legged between his familiar animals: the destructive rat above, the beneficent bull and stag below. These are the same beasts as the steeds of Juno and Jupiter Dolichenus (Pl. 116) and their presence here may serve to 'place' Cernunnos in the same traditional mainstream of Taurean overseers. Quite incongruous with the rough, trousered and horned god are his two supporters, a very classically poised Apollo and Mercury. But if the prime attribute of Cernunnos is seen to be his riches, then their functions are complementary to his: Mercury is traditionally bringer of wealth, and Apollo is the Sun God, hence the ruler of all things golden.

< 134 Osiris-Ammon-Serapis

Bronze statuette from Karanis, Egypt, late third-early fourth century A.D. University of Michigan, Kelsey Museum of Archaeology.

The three greatest gods of Egypt were Osiris of Abydos, Ammon of Thebes, and Serapis of Alexandria. Osiris' white crown of Upper Egypt surmounts the ram's horns of Ammon on the head of this figure, whose noble head and ample garments mark him as Serapis. His arms are in the position of the famous seated Serapis of Bryaxis (see Pl. 88), and would presumably have held staff and thunderbolt, the latter connecting him with Zeus and all other sky gods.

135 Mercury, Cybele, Attis and Sabazius

Bronze diptych, second century A.D. Berlin, Staatliche Museen.

The origins of this plaque are unknown, but it would seem to be similar in intention to some diptychs of medieval Christian art which depict various favourite saints. An individual in a syncretistic environment might well form an affection for four assorted deities: Sabazius as father, Cybele as mother, Mercury as helper, and Attis as saviour. And when one considers the varied genesis of Catholic saints, then the parallel is quite close: some are historical individuals, certainly, but others are legendary figures or even transmuted pagan divinities; and they come from all over the known world.

136 Dedication to the Moon God, Men
Stele from Dorylaeum, second-third century AD (?) Formerly in the British Museum, London.

137 Cake-mould with Pantheistic Symbols
From Taranto, fourth century AD. Oxford,
Ashmolean Museum. (Cast only shown.)

139 Dionysus and Ariadne ascending in a Quadriga
Terracotta disc from Brindisi, fourth-first century BC. Brindisi, Museo Provinciale.

140 Venus adjusting her Sandal at a Trellis
Bronze statuette, second century AD.
London, British Museum.

141 Goddess with Elephant Head-dress
Silver plaque from Boscoreale, third century BC-first century AD. Paris, Louvre.

Six 'pantheistic' images, very disparate in time and place, illustrate a tendency to crowd every possible symbol into a single image. All except Pl. 137 are centred around a particular anthropomorphic deity. The symbols found on these objects, some many times but others only once, are as follows:

Atlantes
Bow: Apollo
Bull: Moon God or Cosmocrator
Caduceus: Mercury
Cap: Phrygian deities
Chous vessel: Dionysus
Corn ear: Demeter
Cornucopia: Tellus or Pluto
Crescent: Luna
Crosstorch: Demeter and Persephone
Cymbals: Cybele
Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux)
Distaff: Fates
Dolphin: Apollo
Eagle: Jupiter or Sky God
Elephant: Dionysus
Eros
Frog
Goat: Pan
Goblets
Hammer: Vulcan
Helios
Ladder: Adonis
Liknon: Dionysus

Lion: Cybele
Lyre: Apollo
Mercury
Mirror: Venus
Moon: Luna
Panther: Dionysus
Peacock: Juno
Pedum: Attis
Pine-cone: Attis, Dionysus, Sabazius, Men
Pipes (syrinx): Pan
Purse: Mercury
Quiver: Apollo
Ram
Raven
Rudder: Fortuna Salamander
Sickle: Saturn
Sistrum: Isis
Snake: Aesculapius, Sabazius
Stars
Stork
Sun
Tambourine: Cybele
Thunderbolt: Jupiter
Thyrus: Dionysus
Tongs: Vulcan
Torch: Hecate or Dioscuri
Tortoise: Mercury
Trident: Neptune
Wheel: Tyche
Zodiac

142 Phanes Cosmocrator

Relief, late second century AD. Modena, Museum.

This magnificent figure has given rise to much debate. Cumont identified him as Aion (see Pls 72–74) from his wings and serpent; Eisler as the Orphic first-born god Phanes Protogonus, who sprang from the primeval egg; Nilsson as a nameless syncretistic god of all the heavenly bodies, a typical representative of second-century syncretism. Certainly he seems to be emerging in flames from the sundered halves of Phanes' egg, above his head and below his feet. The other visible symbols are solar rays and a lunar crescent behind his head and shoulders; masks of ram, lion and goat on his torso; thunderbolt and staff in his hands (the attributes of Serapis) and cloven hooves for feet, like Pan. Around him are the familiar circle of the Zodiac and the square of the Winds (cf. Pl. 67). The inscription 'Felix Pater', and an erased female name, suggests a Mithraic environment, thereby seeming to support the identification as Aion.

According to the Orphic system, all the higher gods have their manifestations on lower levels: so that, according to Damascius, even Phanes, also called Pan, has a mundane existence as the chief of all local overseers – the principle from which they all depend. But this figure is not actually shown at the mundane, but at the cosmic level: he fills the whole Zodiac, wielding the powers of all its gods. The Orphics identify this manifestation of Phanes with the demiurgic Jupiter, the 'mingler of all things', namely of the pure archetypal qualities into the world's elements, gross and subtle. Phanes-Jupiter is encircled by the serpent of Time, to which his ideas become subject when they enter the manifested and visible world, depicted here by a Zodiac circle compressed to a mandorla (like that which surrounds the Cosmic Christ in Majesty in medieval paintings). In its multiple ramifications and the profundity of its symbolism – to which I am not prepared to do justice – the Modena Phanes may be regarded as the ultimate in Mystery iconography.

Select Bibliography

A complete bibliography of the Mystery religions would be immense. In selecting the following list of titles, I have in mind the non-academic reader who wishes to pursue the subject further, rather than the scholar who has the sources already at his disposal. Hence the disproportionate number of titles in English. For the specialist with a command of three or four languages it is sufficient to mention the series of studies published by E. J. Brill of Leiden, under the general editorship of Professor M. J. Vermaseren, modestly entitled Études Préliminaires aux Religions Orientales dans l'Empire Romain. Already numbering over eighty titles, many of them sets of two or more volumes, this tremendous undertaking seeks to present in its entirety the surviving evidence, literary and archaeological, for the Oriental cults. My debt to Professor Vermaseren's work as editor and writer is evident.

I have not listed the primary literary sources. The ancient writers most concerned with these subjects are Plato, Philo Judaeus, Plutarch, Apuleius, Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus, Sallust, Proclus, the Emperor Julian, and the anonymous writers of the Orphic Hymns, the Chaldaean Oracles, the Corpus Hermeticum, the Apocrypha and the Nag Hammadi texts. To these must be added as secondary sources the Christian Fathers whose writings include information on Gnosticism and other esotericisms, particularly Origen and Clement of Alexandria.

In my work of interpretation I have drawn on readings in comparative religion and occult philosophy which have little or no direct bearing on the subject, but which, together with information gained by word of mouth, is essential for the syncretic understanding I have sought. Works on art and architecture have also been invaluable.

- Besant, Annie, Esoteric Christianity, London, 1901.
 Bonner, C., Studies in Magical Amulets, Ann Arbor, 1954.
 Brown, Peter, The Making of Late Antiquity, Cambridge, Mass., 1978.
 Browning, Robert, The Emperor Julian, Berkeley, 1976.
 Campbell, Leroy, Mithraic Iconography and Ideology, Leiden, 1968.
 Carcopino, Jérôme, Aspects Mystiques de la Rome Païenne, Paris, 1942.
 —, De Pythagore aux Apôtres; Études sur la Conversion du Monde Romain, Paris, 1956.
 Cumont, Franz, The Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism, Chicago, 1911.
 —, Lux Perpetua, Paris, 1949.
 Dart, John, The Laughing Savior, New York, 1976.
 Ferguson, John, The Religions of the Roman Empire, London, 1970.
 Festugière, A., Hermétisme et Mystique Païenne, Paris, 1967.
 Gersh, Stephen, Iamblichus to Erigena, Leiden, 1978.
 Glueck, Nelson, Deities and Dolphins, Toronto, 1965.
 Gorman, Peter, Pythagoras, a Life, London, 1979.
 Grant, Frederick C. (ed.), Hellenistic Religions: the Age of Syncretism, New York, 1953.
 Griffiths, J. Gwynn, The Isis Book, Leiden, 1976.
 Hanfmann, George M.A., The Season Sarcophagus in Dunbarton Oaks, Cambridge, Mass., 1951.
 Holland-Smith, John, The Death of Classical Paganism, London, 1976.
 Jonas, Hans, The Gnostic Religion: the Message of the Alien God and the Beginnings of Christianity, Boston, 1958.
 Kakouri, Katerina, Dionysaika: Aspects of the Popular Thracian Religion of Today, Athens, 1965.
 Kerényi, Carl, Dionysus: Archetypal Image of Indestructible Life, Princeton, 1976.
 Lacarrière, Jacques, The Gnostics, New York, 1977.
 Levi, Doro, Aion, Boston, 1944.
 L'Orange, H. P., Studies in the Iconography of Cosmic Kingship, Oslo, 1953.
 Mead, G. R. S., Orpheus, London, 1965.
 —, Thrice-Greatest Hermes, London, 1906.
 Nock, Arthur Darby, Essays on Religion and the Ancient World, Oxford, 1972.
 Rostovtzeff, Michael I., Mystic Italy, New York, 1927.
 Teixidor, Javier, The Pagan God, Princeton, 1977.
 Toynbee, Arthur (ed.), The Crucible of Christianity, London, 1969.
 Vermaseren, Maarten J., Cybele and Attis, London, 1977.
 —, Mithras, the Secret God, London, 1963.
 Vidal, Gore, Julian, New York, 1962.
 Whitaker, Thomas, Macrobius, Cambridge, 1923.
 Willoughby, Harold R., Pagan Regeneration, Chicago, 1929.
 Witt, R. E., Isis in the Graeco-Roman World, London, 1971.

Photographic Acknowledgments

Alinari xi, xii, xvi, 2, 5, 24, 25, 31, 37, 46, 55, 57, 74, 79, 85, 90, 92, 95, 101, 107, 119; Alinari/Anderson i, iii, v, 1, 12, 14, 23, 36, 81, 91, 124; Badisches Landesmuseum Karlsruhe Bildarchiv 69; Bagatti, Father O. B. 53; Böhm, O. 56; Clayton, Peter 42; Collart, Professor Paul 120; Deutsches Archäologisches Institut, Istanbul 131; Deutsches Archäologisches Institut, Rome 7, 10, 16, 17, 45, 70, 114, 121; École Française d'Archéologie, Athens 84; Forschungsarchiv für römische Plastik, Universität zu Köln 38; Fototeca Unione, Rome xiii, 39, 78; Giraudon 43, 82, 133, 141; Hirmer 48, 62, 83, 112; Istituto Centrale per il Catalogo e la Documentazione, Rome 27, 109; Maré, Eric de 28, 30, 105; Unesco 50; Warburg Institute, London 4; Yale University Art Gallery 47, 68, 71

Index

Italic numerals refer to plates and their commentaries

Abraham 39, 86
Abraxas (Abraaxas) 52
Absolute (One) 38, 39, 78, 150, 165, 43, 57
Actaeon 3
Adam 57
Adonis 26, 14
Aelius Aristides 3
Aesculapius (Asklepios) 5, 6, 88
Age, Golden 37, 19
ages, astrological 99, 67, 117
Aglibol 120
Ahiriman 85, 99, 68, 70, 74
Ahura Mazda 85, 99, 67: see also Ormuzd
Ami Soph 78
Aion 23, 72-4, 124, 142
Akhmaton 26
Alexander of Aphrodisias 71
Alexander the Great, quoted 15, 39, 56, 101
Alexander Severus, Emperor 39, 35
Alexandria 39, 78, 84, 88, 97, 104; Serapis, god of 121-2
Ammon 99, 122, 134
Anahita 127
Anaximander 36
androgynous 10, 81, 89
Angel of the Great Counsel 32 angels: of Mons 11; fight for souls 13; guardian 56; equivalent to heroes and gods 79, to overseers 150, to daemons 83; dance of blessed souls with 109; see also archangels
Anthony, St 19
Antinous 22
Antoninus Pius, Emperor 58, 23
Anubis 35, 87, 96
Aphrodite of Aphrodisias 126, 127
Apis Bull 122
Apollo 39, 132, 11, 19, 21, 85, 111, 127, 132, 133
Apuleius of Madaura, cited and quoted 13, 19, 25, 26-7, 34-5, 121, 12, 16, 44, 84
Aquarius 9
Ara Maxima, dedicated to Hercules 144 archangels 50, 65, 121
Argos 12
Ariadne 133, 40, 102, 103, 108, 109, 139
Arians, Arianism 90, 111, 57
Arion 62
Aristotle 71, 78
Arius 57

Arjuna 12
Artemis 152, 11; of Ephesus 125, 127, 132: see also Moon Goddess asceticism: in monk's path 12, 17-20; in Gnosticism 86; Pythagorean 36
Asklepios see Aesculapius Astarte 38, 110, 14, 77
astrology 22, 70, 24, 111
Atargatis 38, 152, 75, 124
Athanasius, St, quoted 19
Athena 122, 11, 115
Atlas 2, 83
Attis 26, 28, 59, 79-83, 135; dream of 34; legend of 111; costume of 71; and Men 128
Augustus, Emperor 57, 19
Aurelian, Emperor, solar monotheist 39, 58, 26
Avalokitesvara 56
avatar 15, 29, 56, 58, 26, 66
axe, double-headed 117

Baal (Bel) 39, 150-3; Shamiu 151, 120, 122; Hammon 123
Bacchantes 40
Bacchus see Dionysus banquet, sacred 28, 104, 120
Basilides, quoted 86
Bartholomew, St 6
Bes 94
betyl 151, 35, 127
blood 8, 28, 31, 32; magical power in 22 body: prison of soul 17; purification 18; burdensome to saviours 29; consciousness taken out of 35; subtle 71; of Jesus 91; soul or spirit leaves 39, 66; reflects cosmos 131
Bona Dea 98
Book of the Dead 35, 96
Brahmins 15
Brigit 4
Buddha, Buddhism 27, 29, 37, 56, 71, 86, 37, 42, 70
Buddhi 31
bull 116, 117, 123, 130, 133; sacrifice of 13, 99, 111, 11, 59: see also taurobolium; tauroctone

caduceus 6, 24
Caligula, Emperor 57, 20
Callisthenes, Pseudo-, quoted 15

Callixtus, St 58
Campbell, Leroy 67, 69
Cancer 72, 76
canonization, like deification 57
Capricorn 63, 72, 126
Caracalla, Emperor 58, 25
Carpocrius, Jérôme 39, 55
Carpocrates 86
castration: of Attis 24; of Cybele's devotees 20, 111-12, 79, 82
Caiars 18
Catullus, quoted 42
Cauter 69
Cautopates 69, 79
Celsus 150
Celtic church 91
Celtic gods and religion 4, 133
centaur 5, 10, 112, 115
Cerberus 73, 88
Ceres see Demeter
Cernunnos 133
chain of being 25; see also hierarchy chariot 69, 115, 116: see also quadriga Cheops, Pharaoh 121
Chiron 5
Chokmah 78-9
Christ: task of 28-9; venerated by Alexander Severus 39; equivalent terms to 79; and Gnosticism 85, 55; initiation of 90-1; and Orpheus 144-5; and Serapis 22; in Majesty 33, 142; cosmic deity 56, 65; and Jonah 62; and solstice 72; and Attis 80; see also Jesus
Christian tradition: sacraments 25; principles 90; father god 2; magic 33; view of history 60; processions 78; fanatics 99; saints 135
Christianity 56-62; modern 7; pacifist 12; militant 13; and Roman Empire 58; and Mithraism 99; and Cybele 111; and Dionysus 134, 101; and Orpheus 144-5, 110, 112; and Gnosticism 55; Arian 57; and Isis 87
Christians: ascetic 18; modern Thracian 24; characteristics of 27; why persecuted 39; syncretistic 110
Chronos 8: see also Time
chthonian spirits 31, 73
Church: dogma of 90-1; Militant 13, 39
Circle of Necessity 37, 145, 72 circumcision 20
Claudius, Emperor 57, 20
Cleopatra, Queen 57

- cock 51, 52
 Commodus, Emperor 58, i, 58 communion 28, 90, 101, 120, 124 consciousness: changes in 14: taken out of body 35 Constantine the Great, Emperor 23, 24, 39, 58, 57, 99
 Constantine II, Emperor 94 cornucopia 86, 87
 correspondences, cosmic 22, 48, 111
 Corybantes 83, 98
 cosmocrator 152, 25, 117, 142 cosmos: circles of 36-7; order of 49 criobolium (ram sacrifice) 111 cross 50, 56, 65
 crucifixion 29, 32, 91, 69, 79
 Cumont, Franz 35, 142
 Cupid and Psyche 16
 Cybele 110-12, 75-83; eunuchs of 20; rites of 24, 111-12; communion with 28; and Rome 38, 110; and Anahita 127; and Sabazius 135; see also Mother Goddess
- daemon (daimon, denion) 19, 36, 48, 56, 150, 52, 83; good 25; of Plotinus and Socrates 32, 56; promoted to gods 121
 Dalai Lama 56
 Damascus, quoted 34, 142 dance 36, 21, 82, 83, 108, 109
 Daniel 61
 David, King 145, 47
 death: voluntary 18; Mysteries resemble 34-5; in Roman religion 38; in philosophy 70-1; experienced in Mysteries 121; symbols 9; a beginning 40; and end 42; same as birth 60; of Dionysus 98, 100; symbols of 128 dedication 39, 22; of Emperors 56-8, 23, 26
 Demeter 20; Paradise of 34
 Demiurge 91; in Gnosticism 84-6
 Desert Fathers 19
 Deus absconditus 85, 51
 devils 13
 Diana 3; 'multiniamma' of Ephesus 125; see also Moon Goddess
 Dii indigetes 38
 Diocletian, Emperor 58
 Dionysian tradition: inscription quoted 37; vintage-scene 46; rites reformed by Orpheus 112
 Dionysus (Bacchus) 26, 27-8, 132-4, x, xvi, 97-109, 139; Mark Antony as 57; and Jews 78; Zagreus 132, 1, 101; Neoplatonic 134
 Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux) 11, 28, 2, 59, 71, 119, 123, 132
 Dis 38, 9
 divine spark (spirit) in man 31, 90, 1
 Dolichenus see Jupiter Dolichenus Domitian, Emperor 20, 57 dreams: initiatic 34; healing 5 drugs 28, 132, 113
 dualism: of warrior 11; of monk 16; Gnostic 84; Persian 85; in Cybele's religion 112; of Luna 3; of axe symbol 117
- eagle 150, 23, 24, 88, 116, 117, 119, 123, 131 earth: energies beneath 64; magnetic field of 7; and cosmic forces 29, 78; see also Tellus Eden, Garden of 85, 61 egg, cosmic 63, 66, 142
 Egyptian gods and religion 7, 39, 57-8, 79, 121-2, 12, 19, 22, 25, 38, 84-96
 Eisler, Robert 142
 Elagabalus, Emperor 58, 33 elements: crucifixion on 29; four 17, 67, 85, 94, 131; gross and subtle 142
 Eleusis 33-4; see also Mysteries, Eleusinian
 Elysian Fields (Elysium) 36, 40
 Emperors see Imperial Cult and under individual entries
 Endymion 17
 Epicureans, Epicurus 32, 70-1, 40, 42
 Eros 9, 23, 82; Eroses 126 esoteric doctrines: Christian 29, 32, 91; Jewish 34, 79; and Mithraism 98-9; and philosophers 165; of Atlantis 83
 Essenes 12, 18, 91
 ether 83
 ethereal sphere 17
 etheric body 70
 Euhemerus, euhemerism 78, 5
 Eusebius, cited 58
 Eve 57
 evil 84-5, 28, 34, 59, 68, 70, 94
 Evil Eye 111
 exoteric doctrines 35, 71, 151, 13, 133
- fairy tales 64, 30 fasting 18
 Fates 34, 131, 132
 fauns 10, 99, 100, 102, 112 fertility: and Moon 3; and Venus 4; and Sun 8, 68; symbolized by Persephone 13, by Adonis 14; and Priapus 27, 106; and stones 29; and Cauties 69; and Pan 97 folk art 64
 folk beliefs 64, 27-35
 Fortuna 86
 Fortunate Isles 55
 Francis, St 112
 Frazer, Sir James 13, 68
 Freemasonry 14, 91, 98, 71, 73
- Gaius, Emperor 79
 Galli 20, 111, v, 125
 Ganymede 9
 Genesis, Book of 7 genius 56, 47, 83
 George, St, and Dragon 33
 Glueck, Nelson 75
 Gnosticism 32, 84-6, 51-5, 61
 God: and love 26ff.; and knowledge 31ff.; in Gnosticism 84-6; universal 2; supreme, in betyl 35 gods passim; seen as real 35; union with 35; some equivalent to angels 79; relation to Absolute 165; lesser 132
 Graces 8, 126
 Great Mother see Mother Goddess
 Great Year 37
 Greek gods and religion 26, 70, 132-3, 144, 2, 5, 12, 19, 71
 Gregory, St, on Origen 32
 Gregory of Nyssa, St, quoted 26 griffin 121
- Hades 73, 133; above the earth 35; Meadows of 36; planets above 36
 Hadrian, Emperor 20, 58, 70, 22, 23 halo 61, 97
 harmony 9, 39, 111
 Harpocrates 12, 87
 haruspicy (divination through entrails) 32
 Hathor 12
 healing 5, 6, 88
 Hecate 25, 110, vi, 34
 heliocentricity, revealed in Mysteries 34
 Helios 39, 58; see also Sol; Sun
 Hera (Juno) 110, 12, 25
 Hercules (Heracles) 13, 26, 58, 144-5, i, 25, 113-15, 131; arrives in Rome 144; favoured by Pythagoreans and Stoics 144
- herm 29, 125
 hermaphrodite 10
 Hermes (Mercury): cited 22; psychopomp 35, 24; slays Argos 12; Thoth or Mercury 19; bringer of fortune 24, 133
 Hermeticism 26; and Aesculapius 6
 Herodotus, cited 20 heroes 56, 79, 144, 5, 114, 115 hierarchy: cosmic 22, 77; celestial 84, 91, 165
 Hilaria 34
 Hinduism, Hindu terms 29, 31, 78, 110, 8, 37, 70, 71, 73
 hippocampus (sea horse) 55
 Homer 49, 7, 18
 Horae (Hours) 8
 Horus 121, ix, 87, 95
 hybrid creatures 133, 1, 10, 93, 99, 100, 102, 106, 108, 112
 Hypnos (Sleep) 9, 23
- Iamblichus, cited and quoted 25, 121 immortality: in Mysteries 35; in philosophies 70-1 Imperial cult 56-8, 79, i, iii, 19-26 incarnation, divine, 56-7, 121 incubation 5, 88
 initiation: grades of 14, 34; of mankind 14; source of answers 7; Egyptian 121; Dionysian 133-4, 1, 106, 107; of Augustus 19; Herculean 113 Inquisition 20
 intoxication 28-9, 132, 134, 103, 106, 108, 109
 Io 12
- Isis 13, 120-2, ix, 84-7; character 26-7; and study 31; and Rome 38-9; Cleopatra as 57; and Cybele 110, 121; syncretic 120-1, 165; and Virgin Mary 121; and Io 12; and Hathor 12; and Apuleius 44; ceremonies of 90-1; and Jupiter Dolichenus 119
- Janus 38, 39
 Jehovah 85-6, 52, 68
 Jesus: warrior or pacifist 12; quoted 29; crucifixion of 29; as teacher 32, xii, xiv; psychopomp 35; and syncretism 84; and Christ 85; teachings 90-1; confused with others 91; and Pictorian Age 99; and Orpheus 145; and Hercules 145; and St John 17; views of 57; see also Christ
 Jews, why persecuted 39
 John the Baptist, St 87
 John the Divine, St 79, 17, 110
 Jonah 62
 Joseph 48
 Judaism 78-9, 46-50; esoteric 34; and Gnosticism 85
 Julia Domna, Empress 24
 Julian, Emperor 15, 43; cited on diet 18-19; and sacrifice 24; character 83; failure of pagan revival 70, 11; and Christ 144-5; visits Delos and Antioch 11
 Julius Caesar 57
 Juno 110, 24; Dolichena 116, 119, 133
 Jupiter (Zeus) 20, 23; Dolichenus 13, 151, 2, 116-19, 129, 133; and Roman religion 38; Ammon 56; Capitoline 57; Olympian 78; demiurgic 84, 142; Optimus Maximus 150, 2, 118; Exsuperantissimus 150, 2, 123; and Titans 1; Hadad 2; Sabazius 2; sky god 2; and Ganymede 9; Serapis 24; Ormuzd 68; a lower god 68; Baal-Shamin 122; Heliopolitaneus 129; hypercosmic 131
 Juvenal, cited 20

- Kabbala 79, 46, 49
 kantharos (wine cup) 97, 102, 105
 Kerényi, Carl 132, 133, 101, 107 knowledge: path of 31–7, 45; Orphic 145
 Kronos 123; see also Saturn; Time
- Lar, Lares 64, 30, 31
 Leucadian Rock 39
 Leucippids 28, xi liberation from rebirth 37, 91, 145, 114
 Licinus 39
 liknon (winnowing-basket) 35–6, 101, 105–7
 Logos 79, 45, 56, 57, 129; Mithras a manifestation of 99 love: path of 26–9; divine 9, 16; of Cupid and Psyche 16
 Lucian, quoted 6, 152
 Lucius (fictional character) see Apuleius
 Lucretius, quoted 42
 Luna 3, 4, 70; see also Moon Goddess
 Lyncurgus 99
- Macrobius, cited 36–7
 maenads 27, 57, 108, 109 magic 22–5, 64, 70, 86, vi–viii, 27–35, 47, 51, 52, 99, 111, 130 magician, path of the 22–5
 Magna Mater see Mother Goddess
 magus, magi 36, 59
 Malakbel 120, 121
 Marcion 85
 Marcus Aurelius, Emperor 58; quoted 41
 Mark Antony, as Dionysus 57 marriage with god 109
 Mars 13, 38, 39, 99, 118
 Martial Arts 14
 Mary, Virgin 110, 77, 87
 Maximian, Emperor 58
 Men (Moon God) 152, 128, 131, 136
 menorah 46, 49
 Mercury 133, 135; see also Hermes meteorites 35; Cybele as 110
 Mithraism 98–9, ii, 63–74; and Freemasonry 14, 98; and Christianity 28, 99; view of posthumous state 36; and Cybele 111; iconography of 69; Aion in 72–4; Phanes in 142
 Mithras 13, 39, 98–9, ii, 63–74; psychopomp 35; and Cupid 16; and Christ 59; and Aion 74
 Mnemosyne, Lake of 36
 modius (basket) 89, 122
 Moira (Fate) 21
 monk, path of 17–20
 monotheism, monotheists 57; solar 39, 58, 43; Jewish 78
 Moon: sphere below 17, 3, 17, 128; elementals of 22, 64; Hades 35; and impregnation 152; and Hecate 34; and Sun 69, 70, 83, 116, 120, 126, 127, 142
 Moon God see Men
 Moon Goddess 110, 3, 17, 34, 54; see also Artemis; Diana; Luna; Selene
 Mosaic Law 78, 79, 46
 Moses 79, 86, 99, 50
 Muslims, Muslims 12, 79, 71
 Mother Goddess (Magna Mater, Great Mother, Cybele): in dream 34; and Roman religion 38, 57, 110; of Pessinus 110–12, 76–7; and Men 152; Venus 3; Brigit 4; Astarte 14; devouring 17; Hecate 34; and Cancer 76; and Isis 77; Sabazian 138 mummification 87, 96
 Muses 8, 21, 45
 music of the spheres 103
 musical instruments 28, 31, 80, 85, 90, 91, 97, 105, 108, 111, 136–9 Mysteries: Lesser and Greater 32–5; Eleusinian 33–4, 132, xv, 13, 19, 20, 113; like death 35; Christian 91; Dionysian 132–4, 97; occult 152–3; Sabazian 152–3; and prehistory 10; wine symbolizes 120 mysticism 26, 31, 90, 44 myth, levels of interpretation of 68 mythology 48–9 et passim
- Nag Hammadi scrolls, quoted 86
 Narcissus 15, 98
 Nature 85; healing power of 5
 Neoplatonism 28, 49, 133–4, 165, 43; see also Plato
 Neopythagoreanism 49, 144, 39; see also Pythagoras
 Nephthys 87
 Nero, Emperor 20, 21
 Nicaea, Council of 57
 Nilsson, Martin P. 142
 Numa, King 38
 nymphs 4, 108
- Ocean, Oceanus 7, 67, 83, 108
 Octavian 57, 19; see also Augustus
 Odysseus (Ulysses) 18
 Oedipus 93
 omophagy (eating raw flesh) 28, 134, 101
 One see Absolute oracles 110, 94
 Origen 20, 32
 Ormuzd 13, 70, 71, 74; see also Ahura Mazda
 Orpheus 26, 144–5, 110–12; and Eurydice 36; venerated by Alexander Severus 39
 Orphic tradition 36; inscription quoted 36; theology 165, 63, 142
 Osiris 26, 57, 121, 44, 71, 87, 95, 96, 134 overseers 91, 122, 150–3, 116–32; Taurean 117, 133; Phanes, chief of 142 Ovid 39
- pagan revival 24, 11, 43
 Palmyrene gods and religion 120–2
 Pan 10, 85, 97, 108, 142
 pantheistic objects 136–41 pantheon: old Roman 38; local 150, 164 panther 133, 100, 102, 105
 Paul, St (Saul of Tarsus) 19, 79, 144, 152
 pedum (crook) 97, 102
 Perennial Philosophy 8, 14, 98, 131
 Peripatetics (Aristotelians) 32, 40 persecution: religious 39, 90, 99; by Demiturge 85
 Persephone (Proserpine) 13, 14
 Perseus and Andromeda 33
 Persian gods and religion 98–9, 59, 74, 127; and Gnosticism 85
 Peter, St 90
 phallus, phallicism 24, 64, 121, 133, 152, vii, 27, 28, 29, 97, 101, 105, 106
 Phanes 63, 142
 Philo Judaeus, cited or quoted 31, 78, 79 philosophy 70–1, 36–45; and esotericism 165
 Phoenician gods and religion 38–9
 Phrygian costume 59, 71, 82, 80, 128
 Phrygian gods and religion 128–31 pine-cone 152, 128, 129; see also thyrsus planets 36, 46, 53, 132; sigils of 33; see also under separate entries
 Plato 28, 37–8; and Atlantis 83
 Platonic doctrines 17; of love 28; questions asked and answered by 71; of soul 10; of nous 64; and Mithraism 64, 69; of World Soul 74
- Plotinus 49, 85, xiii; his circle 32; his daemon 32
 Plutarch of Chaeronea, quoted 31, 32, 35, 36, 121, 144, 34, 86
 Pluto 13, 73, 88, 133
 Pontifex Maximus (High Priest of Rome) 38, 57, 26
 poppies 33, xv, 113
 Porphyry: on sacrifice 22; on Homer 49, 18
 Priapus 27, 28
 Proclus Diadochus, cited 35, 49
 Prometheus 85
 Propertius, cited 19
 Psyche and Cupid 16
 psychopomp (guide of soul) 35, 16, 45
 Ptolemy V Epiphanes 95
 Ptolemy VI Philometor 95
 Ptolemy IV Philopator 104
 Ptolemy I Soter 122
 Pythagoras, incarnation of Apollo 32, 36, 37
 Pythagorean tradition 17; Great Year 37; questions asked and answered by 71
 Pythagoreans: ascetic 17–18; and Orpheus 144, 112; and Plato 38; and Sappho 39
- quadriga (four-horse chariot) 35, 50, 64, 83, 103, 139; symbolism of 121 quaternity 8, 56, 67, 73, 94, 131; see also elements
 Quirinus 38, 39
- Ramana Maharshi, quoted 17 realization of divinity 37
 rebirth 35, 37, 100, 101, 128; after taurobolium 111; of Dionysus 133 reincarnation 34, 37, 145, 6, 96, 114 relics, magical purpose of 25 resurrection of Attis 112, 80 ritual and ceremonies: intention of 24; of Cybele and Attis 111–12; of Isis 91, 92, 93; of Dionysus 106, 107
 Roman citizenship 14, 164
 Roman gods and religion 38–9, 56–8, 110, 1–11, 19, 26, 78
- Sabazius 152–3, 129, 130, 135
 sacraments, magical in nature 25 sacrifice: human 20; animal 22–4; of Jesus 99; of fruits 27; of pig 31; of ram 32; to Isis 90, 91; by Tyche 132
 Sages, Seven 45
 Sallust, quoted 24
 salvation, in Mysteries 34
 Samuel 47
 Sappho 39
 Saturn 123
 satyrs 133, 10, 99, 108
 Saul, King 47
 saviours, saviour gods 26, 28, 111, 6, 42, 95, 100, 135 schools, philosophical 32–3 Scipio Africanus 36 sea-monsters 55, 62, 108
 Seasons 35, 8, 9, 20, 50, 67, 83, 95, 100 secrecy, reasons for 9
 Selene (Moon Goddess) 17
 Semele 133
 Sepsiroth 79, 46, 48
 Septimius Severus, Emperor 58, 24
 Septuagint 78
 Serapis (Sarapis) 28, 35, 57, 121–2, 22, 24, 25, 73, 95, 119, 134, 142 serpent 153, 31, 52, 73, 83, 94, 110, 142; and Aesculapius 6; in Eden 85
 Set, Seth 59

sex: abstinence from 19–20; power of 19, 68; metaphorical 17; and Gnosticism 51; and Middle Easterners 71; release from 81, 82; with goddess's representative 124, 127

shamans 35, 5

Shiva 71, 73

Sibylline Books 6

silence, why maintained in Mysteries 9 silent 133, 10, 17, 106–8

Sirens 8, 18, 93

Sirius 95

sky gods 2, 118, 134

Socrates 37, 44; his dæmon 32

Sol Indiges 38–9, 57

Sol Invictus see Sun, Unconquered

Solomon viii, 33, 48

Sophia 79, 122, 45, 55

soul: fought over by angels and devils 13;

life a test for 14; rational 17, 31, 71;

relation with body and matter 17, 36–7,

84, 66, 69, 98; seized by love 28; journey of 35–7, 49, 46, 53, 55; judgment of 35;

true home of 36, 49, 13, 40, 64; battle within 36; instructed by myths 48; in fairy tales 64; different views on 70–1, 40;

animal 71; in Moon sphere 3, 128; spiral evolution of 6; symbolized by Ganymede

9, by Persephone 13, by Psyche 16, by

Odysseus 18, by Sappho 39, by Attis 82,

by Dionysus 98, by Ariadne 103; myths of ascent and descent of 13–17, 64, 98;

marriage with spirit 16; guided by Eros–

Hypnos–Thanatos 23, by Muses 45, by

Anubis 87; arrival in Elysium 40; affected by mummification 87; dances with angels

109; crosses Ocean 108; trials of 114

sphinx 93, 94, 95

spirit 32, 56

stars, region of fixed 17, 37, 9, 55, 65

Stoicism, fragment quoted 36

Stoics 32, 70–1, 40, 41, 42, 83, 86

stones, sacred 151, 29, 35, 117

sublunary sphere see Moon, sphere below suffering 17, 42, 82

Sun (Sol): Unconquered 13, 39, 58, 26;

fecundating 14; crown 26, 86; one of a series 43; and Menorah 46; and cock 51;

and Mithras 64, 70; and Moon 69, 70, 83,

116, 120, 126, 127, 142; and sphinx 94;

Logos of 121

Sun God: Elagabalus' cult of 58; incarnated in Hercules and Orpheus 144, in Augustus

19; and Aurelian 26; Serapis 89, 95;

Palmyrene 121; see also Apollo; Helios;

Sol Indiges

superstition 64, 70, 42

symbolism 9 et passim; in folk art 64; in Mithraism, confused 99

syncretism 39, 164–5, 130, 136–42

Syrian Goddess (Atargatis) 124

Syrian gods and religion 39, 150–3, 120–2

Taitean Age 99, 117; oversects 133

taurobolium (bull-sacrifice) 8, 23–4, 58, 111

tauroctone (Mithras' bull-slaying) 13, ii, 65,

68, 69

Taurus 117

Taylor, Thomas 18

Telesterion (Eleusis) 33

Tellus (Earth) 8, 20, 67, 83

Thanatos (Death) 23

Theodosius, Emperor, Edicts of 23

Theusis 133, 102, 103

theurgy 25

Thoth iv, 19; see also Hermes

Thrace, rituals in modern 24

thunderbolt 150–1, 2, 117, 118, 119, 134,

142

thyrsus (Dionysian wand) 133–4, 105

Time (Aion, Chronos, Kronos) 23, 73, 83, 142

time, cycles of 132, 8, 60, 63, 67, 73, 83, 100

Titans 85, 132–3, 1

Titus, Emperor 39

tolerance, religious 39, 164

Torah 79

Trajan, Emperor 57

Trinity: Gnostic 55; Christian 57;

Dolichene 116; and quaternity 131

Triptolemus 20

Tyche 21, 75, 86, 132

Ulysses (Odysseus) 18

underworld 27, 36, 38, 13, 100, 103, 111,

128, 133

union with gods 26–9, 35, 71

Valentinus 86

Varuna 117

vegetarianism 18

Venus 4, 16, 140; see also Aphrodite

Vernaseren, Maarten J. 39

Vespasian, Emperor 39, 57

Vesta 38

Vestal Virgin 20, 38

Victories 46, 75, 116, 123

Villa of the Mysteries (Pompeii) 37, xvi, 107

vintage-scenes 9, 46

Virgil, cited 35, 39

Virgo 76

vision: collective, at Eleusis 33; in death and initiation 34–6

warrior, path of the 11–15

Way of the Ancestors (Pitri-yana) 72

Way of the Gods (Deva-yana) 72

weather gods 150, 151, 2

winds 35, 50, 65, 67, 95, 142

wine 28, 131, 133, 9, 50, 108, 120

winnowing of soul 35

winnowing-basket see liknon

Wisdom Literature, Jewish 78–9

witchcraft 25, 64

women: in Oriental cults 39, 98, 14; and

Dionysus 106, 107, 109

Word of God (divine Word) 32, 99, 60

Zervan 74

Zeus 132–3, 11, 17, 88, 101, 115, 117, 122,

134; see also Jupiter

Zodiac: and Seasons 8; and Chronos 8; surrounds Mithras 13, 65; Jupiter 2,

deceased 9, menorah 46, Sun 50, Moon

Goddess 54, Cybele 75, Phanes 142; perfect realm above 55; turned by

Mithras 65; Aion stands above 74;

goddesses of 76; necklace 125; see also stars, fixed

Zoroastrianism 99

A LIVELY, ILLUSTRATED OVERVIEW OF THE VARIETY OF MYSTERY RELIGIONS THAT FLOURISHED AT THE DAWN OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA

In clear, enlightening text and striking images, Mystery Religions holds up a "distant mirror" to our own times, showing that the quest for spiritual illumination from Eastern religions, an emphasis on spiritual development and experience, and a concern for hidden knowledge are deeply rooted in Western culture. Mystery Religions brings the myths, the magic, the rites, and the wisdom of a bygone age to compelling life, making them comprehensible to modern readers.

Godwin begins Mystery Religions with a crucial discussion of the five basic spiritual attitudes or orientations, one (or more) of which informs the religious conceptions of all peoples of every epoch. He clarifies the various paths—that of the warrior, of the monk, of the magician, of love, and of knowledge—and applies them in a detailed examination of the major mystery religions that follows.

Here is a compelling account of the forms mystery religions took, from the cults of Mithras, Dionysus, and Orpheus to those of the Goddess, esoteric Christianity and Judaism, and Gnosticism. Godwin offers a rich and varied selection of illustrations; the symbolism of paintings, statues, reliefs, and other visual imagery provides a wealth of additional information about these religions.

As in our own day, the people of ancient Greece and Rome enjoyed unprecedented religious freedom and pursued their spiritual quest through a variety of cults, sects, rituals, and sacred studies. Mystery Religions explores this historical phenomenon from its wellsprings in the Eastern Mediterranean to its manifestations in such remote outposts of empire as the borderlands of Scotland. At the same time, Mystery Religions distills those elements of man's spiritual and intellectual growth which these religions embodied and which remain unchanged to this day.

Joscelyn Godwin teaches at Colgate University in Hamilton, New York. He is the author of several books on Western esoteric teaching.

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS

>
ISBN 0-06-06